DENG XIAOPING MEETS FOREIGN SCIENTISTS 10 AUG

OW101226 Beijing XINHUA in English 1201 GMT 10 Aug 82

[Text] Beijing, August 10 (XINHUA) -- Deng Xiaoping, vice-chairman of the Central Committee of the Chinese Communist Party, and Deng Yingchao, vice-chairman of the Standing Committee of the National People's Congress, met here this morning with foreign scientists now on lecture tours or visits in China. The scientists included Professor and Mrs. Lee C. Teng, Professor and Mrs. Shu Park Chan, Professor and Mrs. Mann Chiang Niu, Professor and Mrs. Shiu Jen Kuh, Professor H.T. Nieh, Professor Wai Kai Chen, Professor Pen Min-Lin, Professor and Mrs. R.J. Hung, and Professor and Mrs. Chen Yuan Wu.

Deng Xiaoping and Deng Yingchao had cordial conversations with the scientists and listened carefully to their suggestions on further developing China's science and education. The Chinese leaders praised them for their contributions to China's modernization drive.

Briefing them on the domestic situation, Deng Xiaoping said: "A state of stability and unity has already materialized in China. The political and economic situations in China are better than expected. We now have greater confidence and certainty of achieving our goal of making our country comparatively well-off by the end of this century."

On the issue of China's reunification, Deng Yingchao said that Liao Chengzhi's letter to Chiang Ching-kuo once again shows "the sincere hope of our side to reunify our motherland as soon as possible." Present also on the occasion were Fang Yi, Chinese state councillor, Lu Jiaxi, president of the Chinese Academy of Sciences, and others.

UNCTAD REPORT CITES DEVELOPING COUNTRIES' WOES

[Text] Geneva, August 4 (XINHUA) -- Under the influence of economic recession in the developed countries the developing countries are now facing grave economic difficulties, says a report of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development (UNCTAD) issued here today.

The report says that the external economic environment affecting the growth of the developing countries is characterized by slower economic growth in the developed countries and price inflation in the world economy.

The report points out that net oil-importing developing countries recorded a rate of gross domestic product growth of only 1.5 per cent in 1981, as compared with 4.9 per cent in 1980. The least developed countries could not do better than the low increase of 2.8 per cent achieved in 1980.

The current-account deficit of the developing countries excluding the oil-exporting countries grew from 76 billion U.S. dollars in 1980 to 92 billion in 1981. The larger deficit reflected higher outflows on account of interest payments and profit remittances, which grew by about one quarter in 1981, due primarily to higher interest rates in developed countries.

The report estimates that the annual interest payments of developing countries increase by as much as two billion dollars for every percentage point rise in interest rates in the Eurocurrency markets. The report points out that the developing countries medium- and long-term debt rose by more than 60 million dollars to 400 billion in 1981. The report points out that the most telling defect of the present international economic system is the absence of adequate mechanisms of support for developing countries in the field of commodities, trade and financial flows.

The UNCTAD "Trade and Development Report", issued once in every year, is generally regarded as representing the views of the developing countries on the world's economic problems.

DPRK MEETING PROTESTS SENTENCING OF S. KOREANS

[Text] Pyongyang, August 6 (XINHUA) -- Working people and students in Pyongyang held a mass meeting here yesterday condemning U.S. imperialists and the South Korean Chon Tu-hwan clique for imposing capital punishment and heavy penalties upon 16 South Korean patriots including youth and students who set fire to the "American Cultural Centre" in Pusan in March this year, according to a KCNA report.

Addressing the mass meeting, Yo Yon-ku, director of the secretariat of the Central Committee of the Korean Democratc Front for the Reunification of the Fatherland, in the name of the entire people of the Democratic People's Republic of Korea, extended fervent compatriotic support and encouragement to the South Korean youth, students and people of all walks of life who are waging un undaunted struggle for independence, democracy and reunification, holding high the banner of anti-U.S. national salvation in defiance of the fascist suppression by the U.S. imperialists and the Chon Tu-hwan group.

Representatives of working youth, intellectuals and religionists in their speeches at the meeting said that the arson at the "American Cultural Centre" by South Korean youth, students and people was a deserving punishment meted out to the U.S. imperialist aggressors who are entrenched in South Korea continuously under the mask of "protector" and "helper" and are enforcing the vicious colonial rule, imposing all sorts of hardships and misfortunes upon the South Korean people. They said that the Chon Tu-hwan clique must unconditionally and immediately set free Mun Bu-sik, Kim Hyon-chang and other patriots. They voiced the demand for the withdrawal of all U.S. troops from South Korea.

Among those present at the meeting were also Ho Chong-suk, secretary of the Central Committee of the Workers Party of Korea and Presidium member of the Central Committee of the Democratic Front for the Reunification of the Fatherland; Chong Sin-hyok, chairman of the Central Committee of the Chondoist Chongu Party.

FURTHER MATERIALS ON JAPANESE TEXTBOOK CHANGES

Officials Fail To Agree

OW101319 Tokyo KYODO in English 1254 GMT 10 Aug 82

[Text] Beijing, Aug 10, KYODO -- Japanese and Chinese officials Tuesday met to discuss the textbook controversy currently threatening friendly bilateral relations but apparently failed to bury their differences. Japanese sources described the three-hour talks -- the first official contact on the issue -- as friendly, but serious and solemn, suggesting that the Chinese side displayed a stiff attitude. The Chinese officials were led by Xiao Xiangqian, director of the Chinese Foreign Ministry's First Asian Affairs Department.

Japanese officials included Hiroshi Hashimoto, head of the Foreign Ministry's Public Information and Cultural Affairs Bureau, and Hitoshi Osaki, head of the Education Ministry's Science and International Affairs Bureau. Japanese sources said the two Japanese officials will extend their stay here until Thursday or Friday in order to hold further talks. They were initially scheduled to return to Tokyo Wednesday.

China is demanding correction of "distortions" in Japanese school textbooks about Japan's wartime "atrocities" in China. The demand was apparently renewed in the talks but no further details were given.

Japanese Criticism of Revisions

[Text] Tokyo, August 10 (XINHUA) -- The Japanese Democratic Socialist Party said today that the Japanese authorities should modestly accept criticism by friendly countries on the distortion of history in the revised textbooks, according to a KYODO report.

A statement issued by the party stressed that Japan should actively make corrections in accordance with the spirit of the Japan-China peace and friendship treaty.

The Japanese Women's Conference this afternoon sent a letter to Japanese Education Minister Heiji Ogawa demanding the mistake of distorting history in the revised textbooks be immediately corrected. A similar letter was sent to Heiji Ogawa yesterday by the Federation of History Teachers in Japan, according to MAINICHI SHIMBUN.

Chairman of the Association of the Nonparty Dietmen for Promoting Friendship Between Japan and Korea Chuji Kuno and other Dietmen called on Japanese Chief Cabinet Secretary Kiichi Miyazawa this afternoon to hand him a letter to Japanese Prime Minister Zenko Suzuki, according to a JIJI press report. The letter said the distortion of history of the relations between Japan and Korea would lead to the deterioration of the relations.

RENMIN RIBAO Article

[Article by Wan Feng [8001 1496]: "It Is Difficult to Shirk Responsibility for Tampering With History"]

[Text] The Japanese Education Ministry's distortion of history and prettification of militarism in revising and examining textbooks has aroused a tremendous response both at home and abroad and has been strongly denounced. In order to shirk responsibility, the Japanese Education Ministry has repeatedly stressed its hope that the various countries "should understand" Japan's "system of revising and examining textbooks" and at the same time it has declared that "in Japan, textbooks always have been nonofficial publications" and the editors and writers of textbooks are all "personalities among the people." This "idea about unofficial publication of textbooks" that the Japanese Education Ministry has fabricated is an outright lie.

It was in 1872, after the Meiji revolution, that modern educational reform was carried out through the promulgation of the "Imperial Rescript on Education." In Japan's modern and current history of education, the state has implemented four different systems related to the administration of the editing and publication of textbooks. At the beginning of the Meiji reign, textbooks were edited, written and published freely by the editors, writers and publishing houses on their own, without state interference. This was called a "free system," under which the textbooks, though still edited, written and published by unofficial personalities and enterprises, would be ratified by and filed with the Education Ministry. In 1886 this system was again replaced by the "checking up (examination and approval) system," under which unofficially written and edited textbooks first had to be examined by the Education Ministry in order to check them and see if they were up to standard. If they were, the Education Ministry would approve them and give permission for them to be published and used. On the surface, this system seemed to stipulate a "cooperation" in producing textbooks between the government and the people. But in fact, the government exercised the power of examination and approval. In 1903 a "national publication system" replaced the previous system. As a result, the education department of the government (the Education Ministry) was responsible for organizing the editing, writing and publishing of textbooks. This system was used until 1945.

After World War II, because of the promulgation of the "Basic Law of Education Act" in 1947, the militarist "national publication system" was abolished. In 1947 the resumption of the "examination and approval system" was announced. This was regarded as one of the measures to carry out the educational reform under the new historical conditions.

However, one thing which this system has in common with the one before the war is that the power of examining and approving textbooks is completely in the hands of the Education Ministry. People can edit and publish any textbooks they like but they have no power to decide whether or not their textbooks will be "approved."

The Education Ministry's method of "examining and approving" textbook manuscripts is as follows: Usually, first the editor or publisher of a textbook sends the manuscript to the Education Ministry and applies for its "examination and approval." The Education Ministry organizes its professional and nonprofessional inspectors into a number of inspection groups of about five inspectors each and each group is assigned the responsibility of inspecting one manuscript. The Education Ministry sets certain requirements in the "criteria of examining and approving" textbooks as "absolute requirement," which include whether or not the manuscripts conform to the spirit of the "Basic Law of Education Act," the "School Education Act" and "essential points in guiding study," whether the stand of the manuscripts is just and whether the manuscripts conform to the guiding goals of the various subjects. Another requirement, which is regarded as a "necessary condition," is whether the manuscripts are suited to youngsters and the form, structure and writing of the manuscripts is proper. After the inspection (examination), the inspectors write an "opinions of the inspectors," or an "assessment of the manuscript." The former is the opinions of the inspectors and the latter judges the manuscript according to criteria. Only when the total marks are above a certain limit is it likely that a manuscript will be approved. Then, the inspectors pass the two documents on to the "Course Textbook Examination and Approval Commission" which has been set up by the Education Ministry. After examining and discussing the manuscripts, the commission reports the results of its examination and discussion to the education minister, who finally decides whether or not the textbook manuscripts should be approved. After the education minister has decided to approve the manuscripts, the manuscripts are typeset and copies of them are printed and again examined. When the copies are approved, they are finally defined as "examined and approved textbooks" and the textbooks are allowed to be published.

In the process of examining and approving manuscripts, the Education Ministry gives its opinions on required revision of the manuscripts to the editors, writers and publishers through the inspectors. On the surface, these opinions are divided into compulsory ones and those for reference. However, as a matter of fact, during the past few years, the Education Ministry has always forced editors, writers and publishers to accept all its opinions. Often, more than 100 points in a manuscript must be revised, with a short deadline given for the revisions. In most cases, editors are forced to compromise and make revisions in accordance with the Education Ministry's opinions because they can find no way out under the pressure of the Education Ministry. Of course, there have been some people who have rejected these opinions, but they are few.

The above is the actual situation concerning the Education Ministry's claim that the "editors of the textbooks are all 'unofficial personalities'". The Education Ministry has forced its opinions on the writers and then shirks all responsibility conversely to the writers. How can it make people "understand" this?

Distorting history and cheating the people will never be allowed. It is impossible to solve the problem if one attempts to cover truth with lies.

'HISTORY OF THE SECOND WORLD WAR' PUBLISHED

[Text] Beijing, August 10 (XINHUA) -- Launching a war of aggression against China was a fixed goal of Japanese imperialism in the mid-1930's and was carried out following a long term plan and preparation, according to a new book from the People's Publishing House.

This conclusion is bolstered by considerable data in the book, "History of the Second World War," just off the press.

Authored by Zhu Guisheng, Wang Zhende and eight other historians of the World History Institute of the Chinese Academy of Social Sciences, the 734 page book is the first monograph about World War II compiled by Chinese scholars. It gives a systematic account of the origin and development, cause and effect of the war, and discusses the theaters of war in Europe, Africa, Asia and the Pacific Ocean. The work also discusses in depth the role and position of the Chinese resistance against Japanese aggression in World War II. The book offers a truthful account of the "September 18 Incident," "July 7 Incident" and Nanjing massacre, and tells how the Chinese army and people fought a protracted and arduous struggle against the aggressors.

"The Chinese people's war of resistance against Japan was the major theater in Asia during the anti-fascist Second World War," the bood states, "which, combined with the people's anti-Japanese struggle in other Asian countries, played an important role in defeating the Japanese fascists." In the preface to the book, Professor Liu Simu, the noted scholar of world history, says: "In works about the history of World War II published in the West in recent years, some people continue their attempts to apologize for Neville Chamberlain, the master of appeasement; defend the Japanese fascist aggressors; and even reverse the verdict of Hitler, the prime culprit of the war. At the very least, this small current objectively helps prepare public opinion for, and encourages those who attempt to instigate a new world war."

The professor also points out that China is a country which was the first to resist the fascist aggressors, fought for the longest period of time and sustained enormous sacrifices and losses. He expects the book to be helpful in "determining the similarities and differences between the time of the war and today, summarizing and drawing lessons from this unprecedented calamity in human history, thus heading toward the correct direction and preventing or postponing the new world war."

In addition, he hopes that the book could contribute to "distinguish between truth and falsehood from widely divided opinions concerning about the history of World War II, clarify right and wrong, reveal this period of history in its true colors so as to deepen our understanding of the source, nature and law of the contemporary war."

JAPAN-USSR SAKHALIN PROJECT OPPOSED BY U.S.

[Article by Zhang Yunfang [1728 0061 2455]: "Another Storm Over Japan-U.S. Relations"]

[Text] Following the friction between Japan and the United States over trade, another storm over economic sanctions against the USSR has recently emerged.

The Reagan administration took the Poland issue as a pretext to implement measures to restrict exports of advanced technological equipment and strategic materials to the USSR. It also demanded that countries in West Europe stop trading natural gas with the USSR and stop using U.S.-patented machinery and equipment to lay pipelines. Because of this, the West European countries have been having a heated argument with the United States. The United States also put forth the same demand on the Japanese-Soviet joint project to exploit continental shelf oil and natural gas on Sakhalin (Kuril Islands). As a result, relations between Japan and the United States are strained.

The Sakhalin exploitation project was signed by Japan and the USSR in 1972 in accordance with the agreement of the Japanese-Soviet Joint Economic Committee. The project is within the scope of compensation trade between Japan and the USSR. According to the agreement, Japan will grant $150 million loans to the USSR and will rent drilling technology, machinery and spare parts from the United States. After the project is completed, the USSR will supply oil and natural gas to Japan at a low price for 20 years. Japan expects to get 3 million tons of liquified natural gas [lng] annually. This is a relatively big project in the Japanese-Soviet economic contacts.

In February this year, the United States suddenly informed Japan that the Japanese-Soviet joint project on Sakhalin was one of seven projects the United States had imposed economic sanctions against and that the United States was not going to permit Japan to employ U.S. technology and American machinery and spare parts for the construction work of the project. In June Reagan wrote a letter to Suzuki and reiterated that the United States would not slacken economic sanctions against the USSR. He wanted Japan to act in deference to the will of the United States.

The strong demand of the United States may lead to a miscarriage of the Japanese-Soviet joint exploitation project on Sakhalin. In June, during the summit meeting of the heads of the developed countries, the heads of Japan and the United States had a talk. Prime Minister Suzuki pointed out that the United States should relax its requirements and exclude the Japanese-Soviet joint exploitation project of oil and natural gas in Sakhalin from the economic sanction. Following that, Forei Minister Yoshio Sakurauchi and Minister of International Trade and Industry Shintaro Abe wrote letters to U.S. Secretary of State Alexander Haig and Commerce Department Secretary Malcolm Baldridge respectively, hoping that the United States would consider their options. However, the United States did not pay any attention to them. It went so far as to say that if Japan and other foreign enterprises violate the U.S. sanctions, the United States may adopt antagonistic measures on the enterprises' capital in the United States.

The words and deeds of the United States irritated Japan. At the beginning of July, Deputy Minister of International Trade and Industry Fujihara openly criticized the U.S. sanction at a press conference. He said that the U.S. sanction was "rude and has infringed the sovereignty of other countries," and that it is "ridiculous from the viewpoint of international law." On 20 July the Japanese ambassador to the United States paid an official visit to the U.S. deputy secretary of state and transmitted the four official comments of the Japanese Government that the demand of the United States was "difficult to accept." Meanwhile, Japan decided to continue implementing the contract of joint exploitation of oil and natural gas in Sakhalin without employing U.S. machinery and in disregard of the U.S. opposition. Japan held that Sakhalin is close to Japan and has abundant natural resources. After the exploitation project is completed, part of the energy demands of Japan will be solved. Moreover, Japan has invested some $170 million in the exploitation project in Sakhalin; if the contract is not carried out, the capital will be wasted. Furthermore, since the West European countries' boycott against the U.S. economic sanctions against the USSR, Japan has been emboldened to resist the pressure of the United States.

Under the circumstances of the decline of the international capitalist economy, the developed countries are all out seeking outlets. The development of the conflict between Japan and the United States regardingeconomic sanctions against the USSR is something that deserves our attention.

[Excerpts] Beijing, Aug. 11 (AFP) -- The new anti-Vietnamese Cambodian Coalition has begun a diplomatic offensive aimed at securing international support on the eve of the United Nations General Assembly in New York. Coalition President Prince Norodom Sihanouk told journalists today before leaving Beijing for Yugoslavia and Romania that the leaders of the three groups making up the coalition will take part in the United Nations session to discuss the problem of Cambodian representation. Vietnam and its Soviet allies will contest the legitimacy of the coalition -- set up in opposition to the Heng Samrin administration in Phnon Penh -- at the meeting.

Before leaving for New York, Prince Sihanouk is to return to China on August 20. He said that after his visit to the United States, he would come back to China again, and then go to North Korea in October. XINHUA PRAISES ASEAN COOPERATION, ACHIEVEMENTS

[Text] Hong Kong, 7 Aug (XINHUA) -- Summary report: "ASEAN Is Advancing Amid Regional Cooperation"

It has been 15 years since the Association of Southeast Asian Nations was founded. During this period, the five ASEAN countries have constantly strengthened cooperation among themselves. With the changes in the international situation, particularly since Vietnam's invasion and occupation of Kampuchea, ASEAN has become a more and more important force for preserving peace and stability in the Asian-Pacific region.

At the time of its founding on 8 August 1967, ASEAN announced its objective as "to make joint efforts to promote economic growth, social progress and cultural development in the region." Thanks to their joint efforts, the five ASEAN countries have steadily promoted economic cooperation among themselves. In 1977, 71 commodities produced by ASEAN members enjoyed preferential treatment within ASEAN, and now the number of commodities enjoying preferential treatment has risen to 8,563. The total trade volume among the ASEAN members increased from $9.848 billion in 1978 to $19.8 billion in 1980.

In the last few years, the ASEAN countries have accelerated their cooperation in the field of energy. They cooperate in petroleum supply and plan to build an electric power supply network among themselves. In addition, they have reached agreements on cooperation in the development of energy sources, such as water power, coal and geothermal energy.

In financial cooperation, the ASEAN countries signed the "Memorandum on Accommodation of Funds" in 1977. In that year, the mutual-benefit loans among the ASEAN countries totaled $100 million. Now the total amount has increased to $200 million. Moreover, the ASEAN countries have also developed cooperation to various extents in agriculture, shipping, tourism and science and technology.

ASEAN's political objective is "to promote peace and stability in Southeast Asia." In November 1971 the foreign ministers of the five countries made a proposal on turning Southeast Asia into a "zone of peace, freedom and neutrality." Thereafter, the ASEAN countries did a great deal of work toward this end. In the 1970's they unanimously rejected the proposal made by the Soviet Union on an "ASEAN collective security system." Since Vietnam's invasion and occupation of Kampuchea at the end of 1978, ASEAN has all along condemned Vietnam's crimes of violating the UN Charter and committing agression against a neighboring country, supported the Democratic Kampuchean Government and refused to recognize the puppet Phnom Penh regime propped up by Hanoi.

ASEAN is not a military bloc, but the ASEAN countries, facing the common threat of external aggression, have to strengthen regional military cooperation. Among them, there are more and more exchanges of military visits and bilateral multilateral joint military exercises. On an increasingly large scale, those military exercises are primarily for coping with invasions by external forces. The unity and cooperation among the ASEAN countries are conducive to their national independence and economic development and also to peace and stability in Southeast Asia.

BK051433 Beijing in Burmese to Burma 1130 GMT 5 Aug 82

[Unattributed article: "Flourishing New Blossoms of Sino-Burmese Friendship]

[Text] Last July the Chinese people happily welcomed Burmese Foreign Minister U Chit Hlaing and his delegation to China. Now, once again, they are happily welcoming a Burmese cultural dance troupe led by Lt Col (Thein Sein), which has brought along with it the great love of the Burmese people. They are also eagerly awaiting the arrival in the next few days of a Burmese cultural and sports delegation headed by Burmese Minister of Culture U Aung Kyaw Myint.

Such friendship visits reflect flourishing new blossoms in the garden of Sino-Burmese friendship. China and Burma are friendly neighbors as well as developing nations. Thanks to careful nurturing by our leaders, our two countries have continually developed friendly relations. Today friendly cooperation between our two countries in the fields of politics, economics and culture has also developed constantly.

The Chinese people greatly value Sino-Burmese friendship. During his meeting with Foreign Minister U Chit Hlaing on 16 July, Premier Zhao Ziyang said the Chinese Government will continue to make efforts to develop friendly relations and cooperation between the two countries.

Since Burma is a country with an ancient culture, Burmese fine arts and culture are like a precious gem in the world's cultural treasury. The Burmese cultural dance troupe that is visiting China today is just like the Burmese troupe which paid us a visit 1978. This troupe includes artists from all fields. Since the style of the Burmese artists is not only oriental but unique in presentation, the Chinese people will once again have the chance to enjoy its unique arts fully. For Chinese artists, it will be another rare opportunity to learn from the Burmese.

There can be no doubt that the current visit of the Burmese cultural troupe will contribute to the further strengthening of the traditional friendship as well as the mutual understanding between our two peoples. May the Burmese artists enjoy their tour of China and may their performances be successful.

SRV REPORT ON ECONOMIC SHORTCOMINGS CITED

[Text] Beijing, August 6 (XINHUA) -- Production of Vietnam's industry, agriculture and other economic sectors failed to reach state planned targets or remained at a very low level in the first six months of this year, according to Hanoi press reports. The overall economic situation of that country and the life of the people are still unstable and beset with great difficulties, the reports added.

In the first half of this year, although industrial production as a whole increased by 19.5 percent as compared with the corresponding period of last year, many important sectors failed to fulfill their production plans. They included electricity, machine-building, phosphate fertilizer, bicycle tires, sugar, cloth, paper and cigarettes. Earth stripping work on various opencast coal mines was also behind the state plan, and the quality of the coal produced was inferior. Installation work at local capital construction projects was less than 40 percent of what was planned. Cement production reached only 41 percent of the yearly planned target.

The reports attributed the failures to shortages in raw materials, supplies and funds. The industrial bureau of the Hanoi Municipality, for instance, only managed to obtain a quarter to one half of the various essential materials required. Some industries in Ho Chi Minh City had to be content with 30 percent of the raw materials they needed. The lack of raw materials cut operation in some industries in Haiphong to 30-40 percent of the installed capacity.

In agriculture, the reports described the winter-spring rice harvest as a "big victory," but had to deplore reductions in the output of other crops. The Council of Ministers, in a resolution adopted in June, admitted that food shortages remained the biggest problem for Vietnam.

Predicting the economic situation in the second half of the year, the press reports said because of the uncertainties in material supplies, electric power and transportation, it would be a very heavy task to fulfill all those pressing economic plans.

AUSTRALIAN DEFENSE MINISTER VISITS THAILAND

[Text] Bangkok, August 7 (XINHUA) -- Australian Defence Minister Ian Sinclair said here today that he had noted the special concern felt over the Vietnamese presence on the Thai border and the increased reliance Vietnam placed on the Soviet Union.

He said: "Australia shared with Thailand a common concern for the security and stability of Southeast Asia and the Indo-Chinese region." The Australian minister made this statement at a press conference before his departure for Malaysia today after his three-day visit to Thailand.

He said that his visit to Thailand came at a particularly opportune time when ASEAN members were striving to reduce the dangers for future stability in the region arising directly from the Soviet-backed Vietnamese presence in Kampuchea.

Questioned about the extent of the Soviet threat in the region, he said: "Generally, around the world, the Soviets seem to pursue a very aggressive policy which led to the situation as it developed in Afghanistan, parts of Africa and Eastern Europe", as well as in this region, adding that the presence of a Vietnamese-backed regime in Kampuchea placed a particular threat to the countries in this region.

Asked about Australia's stand on Kampuchea, he said that his country is to review its stand on Kampuchea's representation at the United Nations following the formation of the coalition government.

Australia previously abstained during voting at the General Assembly's Credentials Committee to seat the Government of Democratic Kampuchea. However, he said it would be premature to declare that a change was forthcoming.

Sinclair had come to Thailand after his visits to Singapore and the Philippines. During his stay here, he had discussions with Thai Defence Minister Prem Tinsulanon, Foreign Minister Sitthi Sawetsila and other high ranking officers, on the situation in the Southeast Asian and Indo-Chinese region. They also explored the possible avenues for closer practical defence contacts and cooperation.

He also visited the headquarters of the Ninth Infantry Division which is responsible for the defence of the Thai-Kampuchean border areas and the Khao-I-Dang refugee holding centre near the Thai-Kampuchean border.

KANG KEQING MEETS THAI WOMEN'S DELEGATION

[Text] Beijing, August 9 (XINHUA) -- Kang Keqing, vice-chairman of the National Committee of the Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference and president of the All-China Women's Federation, this evening met with a delegation from the National Council of Women of Thailand led by Khunying Orawan Futrakun, chairman of the council. In their conversation, Kang Keqing said China and Thailand are friendly neighbors. "The traditional friendship between China and Thailand has further developed in recent years. We share a common language on many major international issues," she said.

She said that the constant growth of contacts between the women of China and Thailand has helped strengthen the friendship between the people of the two countries.

Khunying Orawan said: "We have come for the promotion of Thai-(?Chinese) friendship and peace in Asian region as well. Women in both Thailand and China are facing a common task working for the development of their own countries. We'll convey the Chinese women's sincere friendship to the Thai sisters."

After the meeting, Kang Keqing hosted a banquet in honor of the Thai guests. Huang Ganying, vice-president of the All-China Women's Federation, proposed toasts at the banquet on behalf of Kang Keqing.

Present on the occasion were Hao Jianxiu, Chinese minister of textile industry, and Sudanond Sinthvwanon, wife of the Thai ambassador to China.

GUANGMING RIBAO ON THEORIES OF WEST EUROPEAN UNITY

HK100421 Beijing GUANGMING RIBAO in Chinease 30 Jul 82 p 4

[Article by Wei Jiaju [7614 1367 7467]: "The Decline of the Supranational Theory and the Rise of the Sovereign State Theory in Western Europe"]

[Text] The appearance of the European Economic Community [EEC] in Western Europe and its activities and development in the international political and economic arena has produced an impact to some extent on the development of politics and legal ideas in Western Europe.

As a group of states, the European Community [EC] itself is not a certain form. But in the process of its development, since the beginning there have been two opposing ideological tendencies as to the future of the EC and what form it should take. One view is that the EC must move toward European federation and gradually eliminate the demarcation of state sovereignty. West Germany's fundamental law (that is, constitution) has made legal preparation for this view. Article 1 of Section 24 of this fundamental law provides: "The federation is legally entitled to transfer its sovereignty to an international organization." According to the explanation approved by West Germany's constitutional court, the EC is such an international organization, whereas the other view is for safeguarding the sovereignty of member states and maintaining the EC on the basis of a union of sovereign states. France represents this view. At a press conference held in 1965, De Gaulle criticized the concept of European federation and pointed out: "According to the drean of the initiators, the member states will lose their state entity. This is an unrealistic proposal. France offers another proposal, that is, the well-organized collaboration between states, which is likely to grow into a confederation." This proposal means "except for the governments of the six states, no one should decide or execute any important matters.

The two different political and ideological ideas are the reflection of the above-mentioned two political tendencies on the EC issue. Extended from the first tendency is the supranational theory, whereas, the sovereign state theory is an extension of the second tendency. The decline and rise of these two ideas is closely linked with the development of the actual political situation.

From the 1960's to the early 1970's, the EC was in the prime of its development and confident about the prospects of union. As a result, the supranational theory was popular at that time. (Beisikatuoer) [6296 2448 595 5192 1422] systematically summarized this view in his book published in 1972: "Law of Union -- a New Phenomenon in International Relations From the Experience of the EC." He held that the establishment of the EC was a rearrangement of sovereignty and redistribution of responsibilities in a general scope beyond the limits of member states. The premise of union is the "nature of division of sovereignty" which cannot be found in classical international law. Traditional sovereignty theory holds that there is only one supreme power within territory, namely sovereignty. The relationship between states is coordination and cooperation only. The international organization provides for the scope of cooperation between states but does not touch on state sovereignty. The characteristics of this relationship developed under such circumstances are weak and unstable. As far as sovereignty is concerned, (beisikatuoer) held that it was "limited, divisible, transferable and can be exercised jointly." With a view to treating sovereignty from the general situation of the EC, he devised the division of the EC and every member state. That is, the sovereign rights of the EC are centered on making political decisions and formulating joint legislation, whereas every member state executes them separately.

The supranational theory raises the idea of European federation to a theoretical plane. Rather, it represents a political ideal. Since the mid-1970's, the EC has been confused by economic recession. In order to protect themselves, all the countries habe shifted their troubles to others. The supranational theory was thus challenged by harsh reality. People have gradually realized that supranational sovereignty is ultimately void and useless. In real life, only the concrete sovereignty of a member state has the final say. The sovereign states have to go into action in various forms in order to adapt themselves to the situation.

Up to now, many scholars have tended to distinguish the EC from the economic organizations of other countries by its joint policies and unified action. Since 1974, however, some West European politicians have successively put forward different views on it. In June 1980, French Prime Minister Barre submitted that it was not necessary for all the member states to do do the same thing at the same time and in the same form. Meanwhile, at the 19th academic annual meeting jointly held by the European Research Institute of Holland's Leiden University and Britain's Research Institute of International Law and Comparative Law, an academic report on the EC's "two-tier system" was officially delivered. The essence of this theory is that if one or certain member states cannot take part in joint action, they may not take part in it temporarily. However, the EC and all the states concerned must make joint efforts to clear away obstacles and attain the goal of union.

This latest development on the theory of the EC stresses the allowance for differences and the allowance for delay in taking part in joint action. It is tantamount to laying stress on the activities of sovereign states. If some member states do not take part in joint action by stressing their own characteristics while others have reservations on other policies, the EC will surely suffer setbacks in promoting joint policies. What deserves our attention is a reporter's remark: "If we demand completely identical policies in all economic and social fields, the process of union, which has been slowed down since the 1970's, will get completely bogged down. No one would benefit from it." Whereas the so-called two-tier system "accords better with the aim of agreement than the paralysis of the EC which results form the pursuit of identity of form." Obviously, this is an attempt by the EC to extricate itself from this theoretical predicament.

It can be expected that as long as there is no astonishing improvement in the situation of economic recession in the whole capitalist world, the trend of thought in the EC will continue to tilt in favor of the state sovereignty theory of the West European member states.

EEC REACHES STEEL PRODUCTS AGREEMENT WITH U.S.

[Text] Brussels, August 6 (XINHUA) — An EEC spokesman announced here today that an arrangement has been reached between the representatives of the United States and the European Economic Community to limit the share of eleven European exported steel products in the U.S. market to 5.754 percent.

Etienne Davignon and Wilhelm Haferkamp, vice-presidents of the EEC, and U.S. Secretary of Commerce Malcolm Baldrige held a series of discussions in Washington on August 3-5 in an attempt to reduce the tension over steel trade between the two parties.

A joint statement released here later this afternoon said they agreed to recommend "to our respective authorities and industries" acceptance of an arrangement on the export of eleven steel products from Europe. The U.S. side, in return, it said, "would withdraw its pending antidumping, countervailing duty" and "complaints on products covered by the arrangement." They believe, the statement stressed, "that this arrangement would be a major step towards ending the constant litigation and dispute over trade in steel, which has been a source of irritation between the EEC and the U.S. for many years."

According to recent reports here, the average bracket in 1977-1981 for the eleven products under discussion was 6 to 6.5 percent. The U.S. wanted to bring it down to 5.6 percent, but European producers considered a share of 5.8 percent to be the extreme concession. The newly settled figure of 5.754 percent appears thus to be a compromise.

However, this arrangement does not seem to be the final solution. The EEC spokesman noted that although there would be no dispute among EEC governments over this global figure, it still depends upon the judgements of various European steel makers when it is put forward to "Eurofer" for discussion. More important is the fact that "the U.S. industrial circles control a certain veto power." They would have to OK before a final conclusion could be reached. Nevertheless, the spokesman pointed out, the U.S. steel industry should withdraw all their complaints as this was one of the EEC's essential conditions for agreeing with such an arrangement.

CHEYSSON CITED ON NUCLEAR FUEL TO INDIA

[Text] New Delhi, August 8 (XINHUA) -- France will not ask for any special safeguards or joint determination for reprocessing spent fuel from India's Tarapur atomic power plant under a proposed agreement on uranium supply to India, French Foreign Minister Claude Cheysson told a press conference here today. The fissile materials from the reprocessing, however, would be subject to the control of the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) as applicable to other countries, he added.

When asked whether the United States would be a party to the Indo-French agreement, he said, since the proposed agreement would be signed shortly between India and France, "why should they be"? He said his country will be pleased to supply nuclear fuel for the Tarapur plant.

France had been requested to supply low degree of uranium and technique in this field, he noted.

C. Cheysson, who arrived here for one day's visit to India, called on Mrs. Indira Gandhi and talked with India's external minister, P. Narasimha Rao, for two hours. The two sides were satisfied with the expansion of Indo-French cooperation in the economic matters and trade, and expressed the hope for further progress. Cheysson left for home tonight.

NETHERLANDS WARNS AGAINST REJECTING U.S. MISSILES

[Text] Brussels, August 6 (XINHUA) -- A Dutch Government report yesterday warned against rejecting the NATO decision on deployment of 48 cruise missiles in the Netherlands after 1983. A 224-page report by the scientific council on government policy said postponement of the decision since 1979 had already undermined the Dutch position in NATO, and if the rejection was made, it could seriously damage NATO.

NATO decided in December 1979 to begin deploying 572 U.S.-made cruise and Pershing-2 missiles in Western Europe by the end of 1983. Out of the five countries designated so far, the plan remains to be ratified by the Netherlands and Belgium.

FINNISH ANTISUBMARINE PATROLS INCREASED

[Text] Helsinki, August 9 (XINHUA) -- The Finnish Frontier Guard has reinforced their coastal patrols and supervision off the coast of Avenanmaa Province, south Finland, following the announced re-appearance of an unidentified submarine in the Finnish waters last weekend. Foreign submarines have violated the Finnish territorial waters off Ahvenan coast three times this summer, according to newspaper reports here.

Finnish Foreign Minister Par Stenback was reportedly following the development closely. After meeting Finnish Foreign Minister Par Stenback on August 6, state secretary of Swedish Foreign Minister Leif Leifland told news reporters that Sweden and Finland will cooperate, and coordinate in patrolling against the trespasses of the submarines upon the territorial waters.

The Finnish newspaper HELSINGIN SANOMAT pointed out in an article on August 7 that the repeated appearance of foreign submarines off the Swedish coast is aimed at a complete investigation of the Swedish coastal defence, the military equipment and installations in the Danish Strait and its adjoining waters. The activities are to investigate the passage of the Baltic Sea as well as a trial navigation or a manoeuvre, the article added. It is not clear why the recent years have seen growing activities of the submarines, the article stressed, but a convincing explanation is that the Warsaw Pact feels it necessary to reconnoitre thoroughly the defence area in the Danish Strait with the deterioration of the international situation. During the past years the Warsaw Pact has strengthened its landing force in the Baltic areas, it added.

[Text] Belgrade, August 4 (XINHUA) -- Pressing international problems and the present non-aligned countries' activities were discussed by Cuban Foreign Minister Isidoro Malmierca and Yugoslav Foreign Minister Lazar Mojsov in their talks concluded here this morning, according to the Yugoslav national news agency TANJUG.

"Mojsov and Malmierca agreed that now, with international communications channels completely paralysed, it is necessary to preserve the unity and action capability of the movement of non-alignment in order to enable it to make its full contribution to overcoming the grave crisis besetting the world today," said the TANJUG report.

The two foreign ministers were also reported to have considered proposals on measures and activities by the non-aligned countries in connection with their seventh summit due to be held in Baghdad next month.

TANJUG said no agreement was reached on recent proposals that the summit be postponed or its venue changed because of the war between Iran and Iraq. The Cuban foreign minister arrived here yesterday on a working visit and left here today.

EGYPTIAN, PLO DELEGATIONS HOLD DISCUSSIONS

[Text] Cairo, August 8 (XINHUA) -- Egyptian Minister of State for Foreign Affairs Butrus Ghali held lengthy talks here yesterday with a PLO delegation led by member of its Executive Committee Sidqi Ad-Dajani. After the talks Ad-Dajani hailed Egypt's position stressing United States support to the Palestinains' right to self-determination.

The talks followed a meeting of President Husni Mubarak and his top political aides reviewing the latest developments in Lebanon and deputy premier Kamal Hasan 'Ali's talks with U.S. officials in Washington.

'Ali told reporters after the meeting that Egypt has not taken a decision concerning the acceptance of the Palestinians. He insisted that before the departure of the Palestinians from Beirut, there must be a comprehensive solution to the Palestinian problem.

He added that Egypt is for the setting up of a provisional government for the Palestinian command and not for hosting the Palestinian fighters.

'ARAFAT SAYS 'FINAL AGREEMENT' ON BEIRUT REACHED

[Text] Beirut, August 9 (XINHUA) -- Chairman of the Executive Committee of the Palestine Liberation Organization Yasir 'Arafat said the United States, Lebanon and the PLO have concluded a "final agreement" on the withdrawal of the Palestinian armed forces from Lebanon, Beirut radio reported.

In an interview with the Paris newspaper LE MONDE, 'Arafat announced that Syria, Egypt, Jordan and Iraq have agreed to accept the PLO soldiers after their withdrawal from Lebanon.

Lebanese President Ilyas Sarkis and Prime Minister al-Wazzan held "important" discussions this morning with U.S. special envoy Philip Habib. Al-Wazzan told reporters after the meeting that negotiations on a political settlement of the Beirut crisis had been completed and that Habib was working on a final implementation plan. Al-Wazzan reportedly had passed Habib's final plan to 'Arafat in the evening when they had talks. 'Arafat agreed on the plan in principle but asked for a 48-hour period for discussions before a PLO reply.

Lebanese national TV station in a broadcast disclosed Habib's ten-point plan, under which the PLO is responsible for offering the list and whereabouts of Palestinian leaders, officers and soldiers who will withdraw from Beirut; the PLO withdrawal will be completed within 15 days; the Palestinian armed personnel can take light weapons with them; 7,000 PLO troops will leave Beirut by French merchant ships, while the remaining 2,000 will be transported by Lebanese Army buses through international highways; and the multinational army will consist of 1,200 to 1,600 men and will stay in Lebanon for 15 days.

The broadcast said that the first group of Palestinian armed personnel will leave Beirut for Jordan on August 12. Alongside an optimistic atmosphere surrounding the political negotiations, the military situation in Lebanon is further deteriorating. Israeli warplanes raided west Beirut for three hours beginning 4 p.m. today.

Israeli Foreign Minister Yitzhak Shamir said that Israel will continue to keep up its military pressure on Beirut so as to force Palestinian armed forces to withdraw from Lebanon as early as possible.

U.S. AMBASSADOR, BEGIN DISCUSS BEIRUT EVACUATION

[Text] Washington, August 10 (XINHUA) -- U.S. Ambassador Samuel Lewis today discussed with Israeli Prime Minister Begin a plan which calls for a multinational force to arrive in west Beirut as evacuation of Palestine Liberation Organization fighters begins, the White House announced here today. The plan and timetable, crafted by U.S. special envoy Philip Habib during his 40 days of negotiations in the Middle East and formally presented to Israel last night, has reportedly been accepted by PLO and the Lebanese Government.

The first foreign contingent, according to details made known, will consist of 200 French soldiers. They'll be followed by 600 other French soldiers along with 800 U.S. Marines and 400 Italian soldiers. It was reported that the PLO insisted that at least some part of the international force should be deployed in Beirut at the outset of the evacuation to provide protection for the guerrillas. Begin said on Sunday that Israel wanted most of the Palestinians to leave before the multinational forces arrival.

Begin also said Israel would demand written assurances from the United States, France, Italy and Lebanon that the international units would force PLO guerrillas out of Beirut or allow the Israeli army to drive them out. A Washington POST report said "similar assurances were understood to be in the written plan delivered to the Israeli Government." The evacuation plan does not call for any pullback of the Israeli army during the PLO's withdrawal from Beirut, the report said.

A Washington POST report from Jerusalem said that the plan was understood to include timetables for the withdrawal of the PLO fighters to Jordan, Syria, Iraq and Sudan, but not Egypt. Egypt has said it would support the evacuation plan only if the withdrawal is linked to a wider agreement committing the United States to progress on an overall Palestinian solution.

The POST report said U.S. administration officials privately cautioned that potential problems remain over such issues as "firm commitments on the destinations of the PLO fighters, Egypt's willingness to join the process and Israel's acceptance of French troops as the vanguard of a multinational force."

[Text] Beijing Aug 10 (AFP) -- The Central African charge d'affaires in Beijing, held hostage since yesterday by students protesting the non-payment of scholarship money by their government, has been released, a students' spokesman said today. They allowed Nicolas Bengue, Central Africa's only diplomat now in Beijing, to leave the embassy. However, four students are still occupying the premises.

The students said they would resist any Chinese intervention. "This is an internal matter of Central Africa and we are in no way harming China by taking over our embassy, which is an integral part of our territory", said a spokesman for the students. Chinese officials refused to comment on the matter. (?The) students, said Mr Bengue, had been advised to steer clear of the embassy until the matter is resolved.

Chen Muhua Gives Banquet

[Text] Beijing, August 7 (XINHUA) -- Chen Muhua, Chinese state councillor and minister of foreign economic relations and trade, gave a banquet in honor of Salomao Munguambe, minister of foreign trade of Mozambique, and the government trade delegation he is leading, at the Great Hall of the People here this evening. In her speech at the banquet Chen Muhua spoke of the achievements the Mozambican people had made in their national construction under the leadership of President Samora Moises Machel.

She said: "Since the establishment of diplomatic relations between China and Mozambique bilateral economic and technical cooperation has been developed smoothly. Trade relations are growing steadily.

"China is willing to develop economic and trade relations with Third World countries on the principle of equality and mutual benefit and of supplying each others needs, so as to increase their own ability to develop economy through self-reliance," Chen Muhua stated.

In reply, Minister Munguambe said that his country attached importance to consolidating and deepening its friendly relations with China. The relations of friendship, unity and militancy between the two peoples were initiated when the Mozambican people began their struggle for national independence.

Minister Munguambe said that the current international structure of economic relations could not satisfy the aspirations of the developing countries, because it had been based on the domination of the developed powers over the developing countries, in an attempt to protract the differences between the rich and the poor, between the producers and consumers, and between the exploiters and the exploited. The economic development of Mozambique called for urgent change in the international economic relations.

FLOOD CONTROL EFFORTS REPORTED ON HUANG HE

[Text] Beijing, August 10 (XINHUA) -- Water from the second largest flood flow of the Yellow River since 1949 emptied into sea at 14:00 hours yesterday, through Lijin hydrological station in Shandong Province, the Central Flood Control Headquarters under the State Council announced today.

The flow was caused by downpours in the middle reaches of the Yellow River starting late July. On August 2, the flow passing through Huayuankou hydrological station near Zhengzhou was 15,300 cubic meters per second, second only to the post-liberation record flow of 22,300 cubic meters per second in the summer of 1958.

In order to ensure the safety of Shandong Province on the lower reaches of the Yellow River, a water retarding project was put into use August 6, diverting flood waters from the river into the Dongping Lake area, which is capable of retaining 400 million cubic meters of water, according to the Central Flood Control Headquarters.

Two sluice gates — the Linxin and Shilipu sluice gates -- in the flood retention area were closed at 21:00 hours and 23:00 hours respectively yesterday, three days after they were opened to divert flood waters from the Yellow River.

As a result of the water-diversion effort, said the Central Flood Control Headquarters, the water flow in the section of the Yellow River in Shandong Province was reduced to below 8,000 cubic meters per second. The flow was measured at 5,800 cubic meters per second at Lijin hydrological station yesterday.

GONGREN RIBAO FAVORS TRADE UNION REORGANIZATION

[Editorial: "A Mass Organization Must Be Run by the Masses"]

[Text] The Fourth Plenary Session of the Ninth Executive Committee of the All-China Federation of Trade Unions has just ended successfully. One of the main themes of this session was to examine and discuss the organizational reform in the organs of the national trade union federation. Conscientiously and properly carrying out the organizational reform in trade union organs will have important and far-reaching impacts on the improvement of trade union work in our country.

Organizational reform is an important strategic decision of great significance made after thorough deliberation and meticulous preparations by the CPC Central Committee. Now the general political guideline for our country's socialist modernization has already been laid down; the task of setting to right things which have been thrown into disorder in the guiding ideology field has already been completed; the national economy has already begun to develop along a healthy course after preliminary readjustment; and a political situation characterized by stability and unity which has seldom been witnessed since the 1960's has already emerged. Making our organizations and system fit the objective requirement of historical development is one of the important guarantees for the further development of this excellent situation. Only by making the best use of this opportunity to carry out organizational and system reform can we ensure that our party's and government's various guidelines and policies shall be vigorously implemented, and that the socialist modernization drive shall develop day after day.

With regard to the organizations of the trade union federation, the principal purpose of organizational reform is to strengthen their link with the broad masses of staff and workers, overcome bureaucracy, and thus enable the masses to run the mass organizations themselves. This is an important guiding ideology which we should persistently adhere to in carrying out the organizational reform of the trade union federation, and is also an important task to consolidate and develop the results of the trade unions's organizational reform.

Trade unions are the proletariat's mass organizations which are to be engaged in mass work and which are to speak and act on behalf of the broad masses of staff and workers. The organizational structure, cadre staffing, activities, work system, work methods, work style and so on of the trade unions must be favorable to maintaining close ties with the masses and promoting mass work. If the organizations of a trade union are overstaffed, have too many strata, hold each other up and operate as inefficiently as bureaucratic organs, which the masses are bored of and feel very inconvenient to keep in contact with; and if the organizations of a trade union are inefficient because they always shirk responsibility and never make prompt decisions when faced with problems, how can they undertake the task of keeping in contact with and serving the masses? Therefore, the organizations and staff of a trade union must be small in size but highly efficient, and the strata in these organizations must be limited. A trade union's leading cadres at different levels must have extensive popular support and must be selected through democratic election. The leading cadres of trade unions at the grassroots level should be selected mainly from those excellent staff members and workers, while the cadres of the leading organs of trade unions should be selected mainly from the cadres of trade unions at inferior levels. They must be able to frequently go deep into the realities of life, to immerse themselves among the masses, to fulfill in good time every task the party entrusts them with and to carry out vivid and vigorous mass work. In the past, during revolutionary wartime and the initial stage after the nationwide liberation, our organizations and cadres in charge of mass work worked like this. At that time, as soon as an order was given, everybody packed his bag and departed. Thus, everybody could immerse himself all at once among the masses and the work could be immediately carried out. However, our organizations have since grown bigger and there have been more and more strata. So, bureaucracy has subsequently prevailed. Although organizations were expanded and staff was increased, their links with the masses were weakened. Today, as we are planning to restore and carry forward the past fine tradition in mass work, this is a truly necessary step in mobilizing and organizing the broad masses of the people to be more ardently engaged in the socialist modernization and construction. As the proletariat's mass organizations, trade unions should even more actively take the initiative and do a good job in this operation. This is what the party's central authorities expect of us and what the situation demands of us.

In order to enable the masses to run mass organizations themselves, we must not only pay attention to improving the organs and the cadres, but also to improving our work methods and work style. Trade union organizations should foster a good work style which is readily accepted by the masses. Trade union cadres, especially trade union leading cadres at different levels, must constantly go deep into the grassroots levels and the realities of life, immerse themselves and live among the masses, make friends with the masses and try their best to understand the masses' thoughts, emotions and demands, so as to make trade union communications channels and links between the party and the masses. Trade union cadres should also be adept at carrying out investigations and studies, finding out a vast amount of first-hand source materials and discovering new circumstances, new problems and various typical cases, so as to put forth practical opinions, proposals and methods to the party and be capable assistants to the party in doing work concerning the masses of staff and workers. Improving work style and work methods in this way will be even more difficult than streamlining organizations. All trade union organizations must earnestly attach importance to this task in carrying out organizational reform. If we only pay attention to the streamlining of organizations and overlook the need for improvement of work style, we will not only fail to consolidate and develop the results achieved in streamlining organizations, but will even take the road back. As the saying goes, a boat sailing against the current must forge ahead or it will be driven back. We must advance all the way and can never draw back. Although they have not yet started organizational reform at present, those trade union organizations at and below the provincial and municipal levels may also take up the improvement of style right away.

Carrying out organizational reform in trade unions does not mean weakening the cadres and force of trade unions. Instead, trade unions will be entrusted with heavier and heavier tasks. We hope that the party committees at all levels will reorganize and put the trade union organizations on a sound basis according to the directive of the CPC Central Committee; try to staff the leading bodies and trade unions with capable cadres in accordance with the principle of recruiting revolutionary, young, well-educated and professionally competent cadres; and thus render the trade union work more dynamic and give free rein to their expected roles in the four modernizations drive.

SUN YAT-SEN'S REINTERPRETATION OF PRINCIPLES

[Text] After the failure of the revolution of 1911, Dr Sun Yat-sen experienced a series of setbacks and failures, including the "second revolution" and the campaign to uphold the constitution. In the campaign to uphold the constitution, he relied on warlords in the south to fight the northern worlords. But "in the struggle for power, militarymen in the south and the north are birds of a feather." As a result, he came to grief in every respect and got nowhere. Chen Jiongming, who had been cultivated by him for many years and was believed to be a "revolutionary general" who could be "relied upon," took advantage of the northern warlords' impending capture of Jiangxi in June 1982 to stage an armed revolt in Guangzhou, offering a reward of 200,000 yuan for the capture of Dr Sun Yat-sen. "Trouble came from within." Chen Jiongming's revolt was a shattering experience for Dr Sun Yat-sen, throwing him into the depths of despair.

While Dr Sun Yat-sen was in despair, the Russian October Revolution occurred, followed by the birth of the Communist Party of China. The Communist International and the Communist Party of China offered a helping hand to Dr Sun Yat-sen, urging him to sum up experiences and lessons since the revolution of 1911. He embarked upon a new path.

From the shining light of the October Revolution, Dr Sun Yat-sen saw hope for China. In early 1918, he sent Lenin a cable of greetings expressing "a desire for unity between the two parties of China and Russia in a joint struggle." In December 1921, Dr Sun Yat-sen received in Guilin Maring, a representative of the Communist International. Maring proposed that: 1) there must be a good political party that unites people from all walks of life, the worker-peasant masses in particular; and 2) there must be an armed revolutionary core and schools must be set up for the training of officers. Dr Sun Yat-sen agreed. In August 1922, while Dr Sun Yat-sen was seeking shelter in Shanghai, the Communist Party of China issued the "first proposal of the CPC Central Committee on the current situation" and convened the second national congress in Shanghai. The Chinese Communists pointed out that China's problems were rooted in imperialism and feudal warlords and put forth the revolutionary slogans: "Down with imperialism" and "Down with warlords." They explicitly set forth the idea of forming a united front with Dr Sun Yat-sen. On many occasions Li Dazhao discussed with Dr Sun Yat-sen "various problems" concerning "the revitalization of the Kuomintang [KMT] to give new life to China," pointing out the correct direction for Dr Sun Yat-sen. In August the same year, Maring again came to China. Guided by the spirit of the directive of the Executive Committee of the Communist International on the establishment of a revolutionary united front by the KMT and the Communist Party relayed by Maring, the CPC Central Committee held a special meeting in Xihu, Hangzhou, and made a decision calling for a number of party members to join the KMT. After the meeting, Chen Duxiu, Li Dazhao and Maring visited Dr Sun Yat-sen and put forth the idea of cooperation between the KMT and the Communist Party. Dr Sun Yat-sen joyfully agreed. Not long afterward Li Dazhao, Zhe Duxiu, Cai Hesen, Zhang Tailei, Zhang Guotao, and others successively joined the KMT.

In September and November 1922, Dr Sun Yat-sen successively held meetings in Shanghai to study plans for the reorganization of the KMT and to discuss how to improve party affairs. Chen Duxiu and other Communist Party members were invited and attended these meetings. They also sent representatives to participate in drafting the KMT's declaration on reorganization, its party program and its party constitution. In early 1923, with the help of Li Dazhao and Lin Boqu, Dr Sun Yat-sen received in Shanghai, Soviet representative Joffe, and held many talks with him. On 26 January, the well-known "Sun Yat-sen-Joffe declaration" was issued, expressing welcome for Soviet help in the Chinese revolution and confirming the policy of allying with the Soviet Union."

At the same time, encouraged by Dr Sun Yat-sen, the Guangdong army led by Deng Yanda cooperated with armies from Yunnan and Guangxi to drive out Chen Jiongming. In February, Dr Sun Yat-sen returned to Guangdong from Shanghai and was appointed generalissimo of the army, navy and air force. He reestablished the revolutionary regime in Guangzhou for the third time. In June, the CPC held its third congress in Guangzhou and solemnly declared that "Communist Party members should join the KMT" and formulated guiding principles and policy for establishing a revolutionary united front with the KMT. Dr Sun Yat-sen warmly welcomed the help rendered by the Communist International and the CPC and speeded up preparation work for reorganizing the KMT. In August, he appointed Chiang Kai-shek, Shen Dingyi, Zhang Tailei and Wang Dengyun to organize "Dr Sun Yat-sen's delegation" to carry out an inspection trip to the Soviet Union and invited the Soviet Union to send political and military advisers to China to help China's revolution. In September, as requested by Dr Sun Yat-sen, the Soviet Government appointed its representative to Guangzhou, Borodin, to specifically help the KMT to carry out its reorganizational work. In October, Borodin discussed with the CPC Central Committee in Guangzhou methods to reorganize the KMT. They decided to persuade Dr Sun Yat-sen to convene a meeting on the reorganization of the KMT. On 24 October, Dr Sun Yat-sen appointed nine persons, including Liao Zhongkai, Tan Zhongkai, Tan Pingshan and others, as members of the Central Executive Committee and nine persons, including Li Dazhao, formed the Provisional Central Executive Committee of the KMT and were fully responsible for the work of reorganizing the KMT. On 25 October, Dr Sun Yat-sen entrusted Liao Zhongkai with responsibility for convening a special meeting on the reorganization of the KMT, and on examining and approving the reorganization plan. Borodin was invited to be political adviser to take charge of the work of reorganizing the KMT. Liao Zhongkai spared no efforts to resolutely help Dr Sun Yat-sen carry out the work of reorganizing the KMT.

From 20-30 January 1924, Dr Sun Yat-sen convened the First Congress of the KMT in Guangzhou, which was attended by 165 deputies. Li Dazhao, Borodin and others took part in the leadership work of the congress. When the congress discussed the KMT-CPC cooperation, the rightist faction of the KMT lodged a strong objection. Because of the resolute struggle carried out by the leftist faction of the KMT headed by Dr Sun Yat-sen, Liao Zhongkai and others, and Communist Party members, the congress reached an official decision on admitting members of the CPC and Socialist Youth League into the KMT according to their personal qualifications and on formulating the three great policies of allying with Russia and the Communists and assisting peasants and workers. The congress also adopted the "constitution of the Chinese KMT" and elected a Central Executive Committee. Among the 24 executive members and 17 alternate members were Liao Zhongkai of the leftist faction, and Hu Hanmin of the rightist faction. Communist Party members such as Li Dazhao, Tan Pingshan, Yu Shude, Mao Zedong, Lin Boqu, Qu Qiubai, Zhang Guotao, Yu Fangzhou and others were elected to the Central Executive Committee. In particular, the congress adopted the famous "Declaration of the First National Congress of the Chinese KMT." This was a very important historical document in which Dr Sun Yat-sen reinterpreted the three people's principles according to the three great policies.

Nationalism meant 1) "prevention of the invasion of imperialism" so that the Chinese nation could independently exist in the world; and 2) "various nationalities inside China are equal" and national oppression should be opposed. Democracy mainly meant equal democratic rights for all. People not only "have the right to vote, but also have the right of creation, referendum and dismisal of their officials." Livelihood meant 1) equalization of land ownership; and 2) regulation of capital. It stressed that "when peasants have been turned into tenant-peasants because of a lack of farmland, the state should provide them with land so that they can continue their farm work." It also opposed the practice of letting land ownership "be controlled by a handful of people." Later, Dr Sun Yat-sen put forth the principle of "land to the tiller," stipulated that big enterprises of a monopolistic nature should be "administered and managed by the state" and opposed using private capital to "control national economy and people's livelihood." The three people's principles were thus turned into new ones after the reinterpretation.

If we compare the new three people's principles with the old ones, we see that the former have been greatly developed upon. Nationalism has been developed from opposing the Qing Dynasty in general, to directly opposing imperialism. Democracy has been developed from the abstract "freedom, equality and universal love" and the founding of a bourgeois republic to equal democratic rights for all and the founding of the people's democratic republic. The content of livelihood has been developed from empty theory such as "equalization of land ownership" into "land to the tiller" and the regulation of capital. The new three people's principles which contain the basis for opposing imperialism and feudalism and are based on the three great policies are identical to the basic principles of the programs of the democratic revolution of the CPC. Therefore, the new three people's principles are the political basis for the KMT-CPC cooperation and the common programs of the revolutionary united front.

However, the new three people's principles are still intrinsically different from communism mainly in political program (there is no socialist program in the three people's principles) and worldoutlook (the world view of the three people's principles is the so-called historical view of people's livelihood). It is actually dualism or idealism.

The success of the First National Congress of the KMT marked the formation of the revolutionary united front and the first KMT-CPC cooperation. After reorganization, the KMT was changed from a bourgeois political party into a revolutionary alliance of workers, peasants, petty bourgeoisie and national bourgeoisie.

Dr Sun Yat-sen earnestly hoped that our motherland would be lifted out of poverty, backwardness and protracted split as early as posible so that China could become a united and integrated nation. To "go along with world trends and satisfy people's needs," Dr Sun Yat-sen, with his revolutionary's boldness of vision, implemented the three great policies of allying with Russia and the Communists and assisting peasants and workers, turned the old three people's principles into new ones and promoted the first KMT-CPC cooperation to form an extensive anti-imperialist and antifeudal revolutionary united front to push forward the movements of workers and peasants throughout the country. After that, the vigorous great revolution reached high tide and this ensured the great victory of the northern expeditionary war.

PRC TO ADOPT INTERNATIONAL MEASUREMENT STANDARDS

[By CHINA DAILY reporter]

[Text] China will adopt international standards of measurement and quality in order to promote industrial and agricultural production, a national conference on standardization was told last week.

The conference brought more than 250 specialists to Beijing to discuss improvements in national standards, which govern production of everything from matchsticks to cargo ships.

China now has 3500 national standards, many of which need to be improved, an official of the China Standardization Association told CHINA DAILY. "The best way to do this is to adopt international standards," he said.

The State Bureau of Standardization has already translated most international standards into Chinese, and plans to adopt them at the rate of several hundred a year, he said.

China resumed efforts to standardize its products in 1978, after a ten-year hiatus.

New standards for structural steel used in shipbuilding have already enabled China to sell ocean-going ships to Hong Kong, West Germany and other countries. The quality of these ships has been acclaimed by the buyers, the official said.

New standards are also helping China to save energy. Revised standards for water quality, for example, have solved the problem of mineral deposits in low-pressure boilers, reducing their consumption of coal by 52 per cent.

At the conference's closing ceremony on Saturday, State Councilor Zhang Jinfu emphasized the importance of standardization. He urged local authorities to pay greater attention to the development and implementation of national standards.

Commentator on Standardization

[Commentator's article: "Strengthen Standardization Work"]

[Text] Standardization work is a comprehensive and basic work for the national economy. The first problem we encounter in reorganizing enterprises and improving economic returns is to strengthen standardization work. We must attach importance to this work, conscientiously carry it out, and strive to achieve results as soon as possible.

In the last few years, great successes in standardization work have been achieved throughout the country. Since the party's third plenary session, while concentrating on the readjustment of the national economy, we have stressed standardization work in consumer goods, energy economization, machine and electric products, foreign trade products and other fields, and have thus stepped up the formulation and revision of national standards. By the end of last year, the total number of national standards amounted to 3,500 or so, some of which conform with our national conditions and have attained the international level. The 100 national standards which have just won prizes at the current national meeting of exchanging experiences and commending advanced units in formulating and revising national standards are the outstanding examples. The formulation and implementation of these standards have played a positive role in improving product quality and production efficiency, expanding foreign trade and export, and enhancing economic returns.

It must be noted that our country's standardization work still remains in a relatively backward state. This situation is mainly displayed in two aspects. First, we have so far promulgated only a few national standards. At present, some developed industrialized countries have generally more than 10,000 national standards. We are relatively far behind them. Second, our standardization level is low. Most of our present national standards are equivalent to the international level in the 1950's and 1960's. Besides, we have been doing badly in assuming the uniformity of national standards and carrying out standardization work. Such a situation, which is very unfavorable to the improvement of the technical level and product quality, is not in line with the development of the national economy. Otherwise, our work will slow down and progress in the four modernization construction will be affected.

Standardization is an important means to organize modern production, an essential part of scientific management, and a technical link between scientific research, design, production, commodity circulation, utilization and other aspects. Strengthening standardization work will have important impact on the improvement of product quality, organization of specialized production, economization of raw materials, ensuring safety and sanitation, and so on. It costs little but can achieve instant results and reep tremendous returns.

Some comrades, including some leading comrades who are in charge of economic work and enterprise management, have an insufficient understanding on the importance of standardization and even think it dispensable. Such a viewpoint is really wrong and pernicious. Why do we always fail to improve the quality of some products? Why do these products always lack competitive power? The crux of the problem lies in the fact that our national standards are low. Without high national standards, there can never be high quality products. An enterprise must take a set of standards as its reference when carrying out technical reform, and as its basis when trying to enhance the management level. Standardization will set the direction and goals for the technical reform and equipment regeneration in an enterprise. And the improvement of technical equipment and management level will in turn enable the enterprise to produce better and cheaper products with greater competitive power. Therefore, strengthening standardization work is by no means a dispensable thing but a matter which has an important bearing on the comprehensive improvement of enterprises' economic returns, and can never be overlooked.

In order to establish, as soon as possible, a system of standards with a certain level and a certain size to meet the needs of the development of the national economy, we require the joint efforts of the economic departments, technical departments, research units and plants and enterprises throughout the country. All comrades who are engaged in economic and management work, especailly those leading comrades, should regard standardization work as an important basic work for improving economic returns, and should conscientiously carry it out. If we can increase our country's national standards to 10,000 or so within the next 5-6 years, we will be able to basically meet the needs of the development of the national economy.

In order to strengthen standardization work in our country, we still have to take the initiative in adopting international standards and advanced standards from abroad. This is in essence a kind of technical import and also an important technical and economic policy of our country today. If we refuse to adopt international standards and advanced standards abroad in improving the quality of our country's products and expanding foreign trade and export, there will be no way out and our goal of catching up with and surpassing the international level will become an empty slogan. We must carry out conscientious studies, and actively but discriminatingly adopt the comprehensive results of scientific research in the world to shorten the process of probing, to speed up the formulation and revision of our country's standards, and to improve these standards. We are bound to attain the goal if only we can properly organize all scientific and technological forces in various fields, give full play to their initiative, solve those key technical problems one by one in a down-to-earth manner, and create the necessary conditions step by step.

RENMIN RIBAO ON COUNTEREFFECT OF CONSUMPTION

HK100934 Beijing RENMIN RIBAO in Chinese 26 Jul 82 p 5

[Article by Yue Ping [1471 1627]: "It Is Necessary To Pay Serious Attention to the Countereffect of Consumption on Production"]

[Text] Correctly understanding the relations between production and consumption and paying serious attention to the countereffect of consumption on production when bringing into full play the leading role of production, have important and realistic bearings on our economic construction, especially on solving some problems in our present economic work.

In the past few years, the main content of our national economic readjustment plan has been to readjust the proportion in relations between accumulation and consumption. In fact, the gist has been to solve the problem of production being divorced from consumption from the macroeconomic angle. Through readjustment, the production of consumer goods has been increasing by a large margin for successive years. In addition, the state has been doing its best in improving the people's livelihood. Now we have more commodities, the income of the people has increased, the market is thriving and remarkable results have been achieved in our readjustment work. However, we have not completely solved the problem of production being divorced from consumption.

This is due to improper planning, one-sidedly seeking profits by some departments and blindness in production. As a result, some commodities, particularly commodities with large profits, have become unmarketable and stockpiled. But products with small profits that are needed by the masses are produced in small quantities, and they are often in short supply and out of stock. To solve this problem, we must do our best in various aspects. Viewed from the angle of ideological understanding, we must thoroughly understand Marxist political economics with regard to the principle of dialectical relations between production and consumption, and pay serious attention to the countereffect of consumption on production.

Consumption is an important link in the course of social reproduction. No matter what the social character of the course of social reproduction, it will inevitably go in circles through the four links of production (direct production), allocation, exchange and consumption. Of the four links, production occupies the most important position, but consumption has a countereffect. It can, in return, affect production and prolong or promote the development of production. Consumption is the motive force, purpose and end result of production. Marx said: "Products are finally completed only in consumption. If a railroad is not open to traffic, is not used and is not consumed, it can only be a possible railroad, a real one." "Clothes can realistically be clothes due to the action of wearing; a house without people living in it cannot in fact be a real house." "Consumption creates new needs for production," "creates the motive force of production." "Without production, there can be no consumption, but without consumption, there cannot be production, because if there is, production will have no aim." ("Selected Works of Marx and Engels," vol 2, p 94) The theory that consumption can promote production was also explained in some works in ancient China. There was the following dialogue in the book "Guanzi" [4619 1311]: "It was asked: 'How does one make the times prosperous?' It was answered: 'There is nothing better than consumption.'" According to Comrade Guo Moro's explanation, the term "making the times prosperous" (xing shi hua 5281 2514 0553) is a mistake, and should be rendered "promoting wealth and prosperity" [xing caihuo 5281 6299 6303]. In modern Chinese, this dialogue means: "When we are rich with material wealth, what should we do?" "The best thing to do is consume as much as we can." Such an outstanding viewpoint prevailed in China 2,000 years ago. At present, that viewpoint still inspires us.

Production is for consumption. This is the common aim of social production. The difference is that in the exploiting society, such an aim is not directly realized. For instance, in the capialist society, the direct aim of production is to gain profits. But capitalists will not depart from social consumption when seeking profits. The aim of socialist production is to meet the increasing material and cultural needs of all members of society. That is to say, it is to meet the people's consumption. Of course, socialist enterprises must fulfill the plans for making profits, but they must not only seek profits. They must assume overall responsibility for the state and the people. This is one of the fundamental differences between socialist and capitalist enterprises. If we do not take consumers' needs into account, but instead blindly carry out production, then the situation will emerge in which we have "good news on the industrial front, bad news on the commercial front, stockpiling of goods and false revenue." As a result, our products will not be real products, our wealth will be wasted and it will be difficult to smoothly carry out social reproduction. Therefore, thoroughly understanding the dialectical relations between production and consumption and paying serious attention to the countereffect of consumption on production are in essence further defining the aim of socialist production and persisting in carrying out production and doing business for the people's consumption.

At attaching great importance to the countereffect of consumption on production, we must pay close attention to market changes and be aware of the needs of the consumers. This is very important whether in macroeconomics or in microeconomics. The phenomenon of production being divorced from consumption is mostly caused by improper planning. Such improper planning is generally caused by a lack of accurate economic information and by a lack of knowledge of market changes and the needs of consumers.

Therefore, having a good grasp of the means of information and building and consummating the system of transmitting and analyzing information and of economic prediction are beneficial to working out correct plans and solving the problem of production being divorced from consumption. Due to the longstanding shortage of commodities, consumers have to ask acquaintances or "get in by the back door" when they want to buy something. As a result, the idea that "the daughter of a queen does not have to worry about being unable to get married" has emerged in some factories and stores. In other words, the market is the sellers' market and initiative for exchanging commodities is in the hands of the sellers, who usually say: "We only have this. Take it or leave it." Now there are plenty of commodities, and the situation has changed. The masses have a greater choice of commodities, and the sellers' market is beginning to change into a buyers' market. Therefore, producers, leaders and controllers should pay attention to the market and to the consumption of their products. According to market changes and the needs of the consumers, they should raise the quality of products, increase the variety of products and improve the designs and styles. This is the countereffect of consumption on production. Some comrades are of the opinion that now it is difficult to be a factory head and to do business. They say: "Even if he is sleeping, a factory head has to keep one of his eyes open to watch the market situation." Comrades who have become factory heads or managers now understand the importance of market information. This is an important development in the idea of management.

When paying serious attention to the countereffect of consumption on production, we must also dredge the circulation channel so as to circulate commodities. What is particularly important is that we must bring into full play the consumption potentials of the countryside, which is a large market. Since the third plenary session of the party, and following the development of production, the peasants and communes and production brigades have been earning more and more money. According to estimates by the departments concerned, at present, the money circulated in the countryside is about 2 million and several hundred thousand yuan, a more than 100 percent increase over 1978. The volume of money circulated in the countryside accounts for more than 60 percent of the volume of money circulated throughout the country. Together with the savings of the peasants, the purchasing power in the countryside is quite considerable. But in many places, industrial products are not available even if the peasants have the money to buy. Furthermore, it is difficult to transport industrial products to the countryside. As a result, both ends suffer. This shows that people have not paid enough attention to the potential in the countryside, which is a large market for industrial products. Recently, the State Council made a decision to change the system of circulating industrial products according to the work divided between the cities and the countryside into a new system based on the division of commodities and connecting the cities with the countryside. The large market, consisting of China's 800 million peasants, has long attracted the attention of foreign capitalists. It is all the more necessary for us to pay close attention to this market.

Consumer goods are sold mainly to the inhabitants of cities and in the countryside. In paying serious attention to the countereffect of consumption on production, we must correctly handle the problems of how to understand the inhabitants' individual consumption.

First, the problem of deposit. The state has two main channels for circulating currency. One is selling commodities (which includes providing services) and the other is absorbing deposits. In the past few years, deposits and savings have increased by a large margin. According to statistics, by the end of 1981, the people in cities and the countryside had savings of 52.4 billion yuan, an increase of 150 percent over 1978. The greater part of the masses' purchasing power not realized was deposited in banks or in credit cooperatives. The large increase in savings reflects the increase in the people's income. It also reflects the people's concern and support for the construction cause of our country and their faith in the future of our economic development. It is completely correct for us to encourage the masses to deposit in banks or credit cooperatives the money which is not used for the time being. This is also beneficial to helping the masses arrange their family living expenses in a planned way.

But it will produce a side effect, if deposits are overemphasized, because in doing so, the masses' consumption will be restricted and they will give up the idea of buying what they should buy. Absorbing deposits, withdrawing currency from circulation and then giving loans to industrial and commercial enterprises are beneficial to promoting social reproduction. But it is not, after all, so effective as withdrawing currency from circulation by selling commodities, because in this way the value of commodities can be directly realized to promote social reproduction in a more favorable manner. Furthermore, a deposit itself has the characteristic of internal debt. From an immediate point of view, to deposit in banks the part of purchasing power that has not been realized by the inhabitants is beneficial to balancing revenue and expenditure and to stabilizing the market. But from a long-term point of view, there is a latent danger, namely, when there are setbacks in economic development, depositors will possibly draw a large amount of money from banks and hurry to the market to buy things. Therefore, when encouraging the inhabitants to deposit their money in banks, we must do our best in withdrawing currency from circulation by expanding the marketing of commodities.

Second, the problem of hard struggle. Our party and people have the glorious tradition of hard struggle. Our party and people have the glorious tradition of hard struggle. Whenever there are temporary difficulties in our economic development, the people will, at the call of the party and government, economize on food and clothing to support the country. This spirit is quite commendable. Our country is poor, and it has a weak foundation to start with. It is particularly important to develop the spirit of hard struggle. By proposing to pay serious attention to the countereffect of consumption, it does not in the least mean that we must throw away the spirit of hard struggle. The purpose of bringing such a spirit into plan is to bravely overcome difficulties, unyieldingly carry out our work and fulfill various tasks; in addition, we must stop various kinds of losses and waste, put an end to the ostentatious and extravagant style and strictly control the increase in the purchasing power of social groups. We must step up our efforts in this respect. With regard to the people's livelihood, on the one hand, we must continue to advocate the idea of industriously running one's home; on the other hand, we must ascertain that it is normal for the people to improve their livelihood and appropriately raise the standards of consumption through their own labor or by means of their legal income. Fundamentally speaking, the purpose of advocating the spirit of hard struggle is to enable our people to have better food to eat, better clothes to wear, a greater variety of things to use and more spacious rooms to live in on the basis of the development of production.

In the past 3 years, the speedy increase of the income of the staff and workers and the peasants has greatly exceeded the speedy increase of the national income and of industrial and agricultural production. At present, the general situation in our internal market is still that there are not enough consumer goods and that the increase in social purchasing power exceeds the increase in the sources of commodities. Therefore, paying serious attention to the countereffect of consumption on production does not mean putting more money into circulation, nor expanding consumer funds to stimulate the consumption of the masses. We start from the point of enabling our products to be marketable and of enlarging the scope of sale to increase the circulation of currency and to promote the development of production. If you issue rewards blindly and raise the purchase prices of agricultural products at will as soon as you hear that serious attention must be paid to the countereffect of consumption, there is a mistake in your understanding. We must explain this problem clearly.

RENMIN RIBAO DISCUSSES FINANCIAL PROBLEMS

[Article by Jiang Yangguang[5592 2503 0342]: "Uphold the System of Planned Economy, Raise the Scientific Level of Planned Management -- Reading 'China's Financial Problems'"]

[Text] The book "China's Financial Problems" published by the Tianjin Science and Technology Publishing House carried 43 articles written by Chen Rulong, Xu Yi and other comrades.

These articles probed widely into some major theoretical and actual problems in financial and economic work by proceeding from the spirit of the 3d Plenary Session of the 11th CPC Central Committee and the eight-character policy for readjusting the national economy. The content of this book is very rich and one of its main ideas is to uphold the system of planned economy, follow socialist economic law, correctly understand and display the role of finance in social reproduction and raise the scientific level of planned management

Ours is a socialist country and therefore it cannot but implement the system of planned economy and this orientation must be followed unswervingly. The question is how to carry out planned management so as to fully display the advantages of the socialist system. The path we have traversed over the past three decades and more since the founding of New China showed that with regard to the planned management of the national economy, we did quite well in some years, less well in others, and we made serious mistakes in other years. Experiences in practice showed that whether or not the function of finance can be displayed well is closely related to persistence in the system of the planned economy and the improvement of the scientific level of planned management. When we are able to follow objective economic law and pay more attention to and correctly make use of the function of finance, our planned management will become more scientific and the national economy will be able to develop proportionately, smoothly and in a planned way. But when the role of the function of finance is distorted, planned management will run counter to the demand of objective economic law, the national economy will be out of balance and the development of the economy will suffer setbacks to varying extents.

In improving the scientific level of planned management it is imperative to correctly understand and correctly display the role of finance because finance has the function of distributing, regulating and supervising, and because finance is an important lever for the state in managing the national economy in a planned way. In managing the national economy in a planned way, it is necessary to scientifically handle the dialectical relations between production and distribution and between the production structure and the distribution structure, to plan production scientifically and to plan the distribution of the means of production, labor force and consumer goods. In order to handle these relations well, we must correctly use this financial economic lever. It is true that financial distribution cannot include the distribution of the whole social product, and yet it is in a leading position in the distribution of the gross social product. In our country, such matters as withdrawals of enterprise depreciation funds, allocation of wages and awards and distribution of net earnings are all affected by state finance while the expansion of social reproduction, the construction of new enterprises and the transformation of the old enterprises depend on the situation of state finance. To correctly display the distribution function of finance is in the interest of correctly handling the relationship between simple reproduction and the expansion of reproduction, the relationship between accumulation and consumption and the relationship between agriculture, light industry and heavy industry as well as in the interest of realizing a comprehensive balance of the national economy.

Following the basic completion of the socialist transformation of the means of production, the regulating function of finance mainly includes regulating the incomes of the state-owned enterprises so as to correctly handle the relations between the state, enterprises and their staff; regulating the incomes of the collective economy so as to correctly handle the relations between the state, the collective and the peasants; regulating local revenues so as to correctly handle the relationship between the central government and local governments, between coastal areas and inland areas and between the Han nationality regions and minority nationality regions and consequently to mobilize the initiative of various aspects. Scientific planned management demands that the state collective planned guidance must be correctly combined with the initiative of localities, enterprises and staff (peasants). The function of financial regulation represents an important measure for realizing such a combination.

The supervisory function of finance mainly refers to effective management and supervision over the business and achievements of enterprises through financial handing-over and allocating activities (including tax revenues) between the state and enterprises; overall calculation and supervision of the reproduction of fixed assets through financial control over the investment channels for fixed assets and the amount of capital, and calculation and supervision over the scale of development, race and proportions of the national economy through the distribution of social products and national revenue so that the growth of accumulation and consumption will be in accordance with state capability. In fact, the supervisory function of finance means to resort to the role of financial feedback to check whether the planning is scientific and to correct shortcomings in the planning so as to guarantee that it will be implemented correctly.

How can we correctly display the role of finance and improve the scientific level of planned management? "China's Financial Problems" summed up the experiences in this respect and the following points merit our attention.

First, correctly handle the relationship between economy and finance and between economic planning and financial planning. Generally speaking, we must first of all give considerations to economic planning and particularly to the planning for the development of industrial and agricultural production and then accordingly we must work out and follow feasible planning, take various active measures and open up more financial resources so as to guarantee the funds that are required by various aspects. At the same time, we must resort to financial planning to calculate from the viewpoint of distribution and redistribution whether the economic planning is active and reliable and to resort to the situation of the implementation of financial planning to check the situation in the implementation of economic planning. In order to increase financial revenues we must mainly rely on developing production; but in making use of economic levers, we must consider their effect on the balance of financial revenues and expenditures. In working out the planning for financial revenues and expenditures, we must proceed from the situation of our strength, pay attention to keeping a balance between the scale of construction and supply of goods and materials and keep a certain amount in reserve for unexpected needs. We cannot just consider the needs in construction and disregard financial feasibility and put forth excessive planning for fund allocation and investments.

Second, persist in keeping a balance between financial revenue and expenditure, between credit revenue and expenditure and between the supply of goods and materials and foreign exchange and also persist in keeping a balance between all these aspects. The key to financial balance is mutual balance between finance, credit, goods and materials and foreign exchange. The balance between financial revenue and expenditures is the basis for the balance between credit revenue and expenditure. When financial revenue and expenditure and credit revenue and expenditure are balanced, the relationship between social purchasing power and the supply of goods and materials will also basically balance. We must persist in keeping financial revenue and expenditure balanced and having a little surplus; we must in no way work out budget planning with a deficit. A budget deficit means excessive distribution of financial budgetary revenue. When there is a deficit in the financial budget, simple and expanded reproduction will be affected, capital construction will not be able to form productive forces, inflation will occur, the market situation will become tight and prices will be unstable and this will affect the stability of people's lives. We must persist in unifying the balance between finance and credit and rational arrangements must be made with regard to the working capital that is needed in expanding production and circulation and for investing in capital construction. It is harmful to the rational control of the scale of capital construction to blindly expand bank loans and increase the investment in capital construction without any limit.

Third, do a good job in transforming the system of financial management. The previous financial system is characterized by unified revenue and expenditure and this situation is not in the interests of fully displaying the initiative of localities and enterprises and improving economic effects and therefore it must be transformed.

The key question in transforming the financial management system is to correctly handle the relationship between planning and initiative and between centralization and decentralization. While it is imperative to persist in state planned guidance over the whole national economy, it is also necessary to display the initiative of localities and enterprises. The key point in this aspect is to acknowledge the necessary materialistic interest of localities and enterprises and to enable the state to control the necessary financial and material resources as a material basis for realizing and controlling macroscopic planned guidance. The actions taken in the past few years to expand the autonomy of enterprises has played a good role and it must be fully affirmed. But when funds are comparatively dispersed, the funds that are centralized in the hands of the state are relatively few. The expansion of the autonomy of enterprises cannot be interpreted as a mere expansion of financial rights. With regard to the distribution of the incomes of enterprises and the proportions for the state and enterprises, it is necessary to study and define a rational limit and to correctly combine responsibility, rights and interests. At the same time, it is also necessary to transform the tax system so as to properly solve the contradiction of uneven gains and losses that are caused by various irrational factors such as value and improve state financial power through rationally regulating incomes by means of taxes. The transformation of the financial system cannot be carried out independently; efforts must be made to carry out the transformation of various systems along with the transformation of the financial system and various economic levers must be properly used so as to display even better the achievements of transformation.

Fourth, step up comprehensive financial planning. Theoretically speaking, socialist finance is comprehensive finance. The theory of comprehensive finance should include the theory of a unified balance between finance, credit, goods and materials and foreign exchange that accords with the scale of construction, the theory of a mutual relationship between the distribution structure and the economic structure and the theory of correctly handling the economic interests between the state, localities, enterprises and laborers. The core of comprehensive financial planning is planning for the revenue and expenditure of the state budget; but comprehensive financial planning must also include planning for credit revenue and expenditure, planning for enterprise special funds, planning for the extra-budgetary funds and planning for special item loans and borrowing of foreign capital. As there are many channels for funds and an enormous amount of funds outside the budget, there have consequently occurred serious wastes in economic sectors. Thus it is, from the point of policy and quantity, imperative to readjust and link things up through comprehensive financial planning. Only in this way, we will be able to display the initiative of various sectors and guarantee that the whole national economy will be able to develop proportionately and in a planned way.

RURAL, URBAN TRADE, GOODS REPORTED PROSPERING

With growing industrial and agricultural production and the improvement of the people's living standards, retail sales volume has increased year after year. The total value of retail sales was 235 billion yuan in 1981, an increase of more than 80 billion yuan over 1978. Most of the commodities that have been in short supply for a long time are now being supplied without limit. Most food and clothing items and necessities are plentiful. As people become more choosy, some outdated, poor quality and high priced goods are not selling well and get piled up in warehouses. In the supply of nonstaple food items, there is a greater abundance of pork, mutton, poultry, fresh eggs, vegetables, fruits, sweets, snacks, alcoholic beverages, nonalcoholic beverages and so forth in the large and medium-sized cities.

In the past few years, great changes have taken place in rural markets. With the implementation of various production responsibility systems, agricultural and sideline production has developed rapidly. Peasants' income has increased. Peasants' purchasing power in 1981 was 63 percent higher than in 1978, a much greater increase than in the cities. Sales of bicycles, sewing machines and wristwatches in rural areas have increased year after year. The number of bicycles sold in 1981 showed an increase of more than 4.7 million units over the figure in 1978. Woolen fabrics, dresses, leather shoes and household electrical appliances such as fans, television sets, combination radio-cassette recorders, which were rarely sold in rural areas, are now in great demand.

Country fair trade, which was banned during the 10-year turmoil, has vigorously developed since the 3d plenary session of the 11th party Central Committee. There are now nearly 40,000 rural fairs and more than 3,000 farm and sideline product markets in the country's cities. The volume of business in urban and rural fairs has increased each year, at an annual rate of 5 billion yuan in the last 3 years and totaling 28.7 billion yuan in 1981, which was 57 percent higher than in 1979 and equivalent to 9.4 percent of the total value of retail sales in 1981. The volume of business of farm and sideline products markets in the cities reached 3.4 billion yuan in 1981, more than double that in 1979. Vegetables, pork, beef, mutton, fresh eggs, poultry, aquatic products, grain and vegetable oil sold at these markets accounted for 6 percent of the total retail sales by state-owned commerce. The farm and sideline product markets in the cities provided an average of 38 yuan worth of goods for each urban worker and staff member in 1981, adding to the abundance of city life.

RENMIN RIBAO DISCUSSES JOINT VENTURE LAW

[Article by Chu Baotai [0443 0202 3141] and Dong Weiyuan [5516 5633 0954]: "Chinese-Foreign Joint Ventures Are Enterprises Conducive to Socialism -- On PRC Chinese-Foreign Joint Venture Law"]

[Text] The Second Plenary Session of the Fifth NPC in 1979 adopted the "Chinese-foreign joint venture law." By the end of 1981, the enterprises jointly run by China and foreign companies totalled more than 400. Among them, 39 enterprises are joint ventures in the form of joint stock companies, and another 360 enterprises are run on the basis of cooperation contracts. The total investment in these enterprises amounts to $2 billion. In addition, there are also some Chinese-foreign cooperation projects in offshore petroleum exploration and exploitation. The initial implementation of the joint venture law has promoted the development of our economy. Up to now, however, some people still have a negative attitude towards the running of joint ventures in accordance with this law and regard this as unfavorable to socialism. In our opinion, this idea is not correct.

We believe that the social nature of a law is first determined by the people who make this law. Here, the legislators or the people who make laws mainly refers to the ruling class of a country, because all laws are made by a state legislature. The Chinese-foreign joint venture law was drawn up in New China where the people are the masters. The legislature is the National People's Congress, democratically elected by the whole people. This law is executed by the state power organs of the people's democratic dictatorship. Therefore, viewed from the process of formation and implementation, this law must be socialist in nature.

Some people ask, since it is a law of a socialist nature, why are foreigners invited in to run enterprises? As we see it, in judging the nature of a law, it is not enough to merely look at the object, scope and contents of this law, it is also necessary to look at whatever it is designed to safeguard and what its ultimate objective is. That is to say, it is not proper if we only look at whether this law has invited foreigners in and whether foreigners are allowed to handle business in China and thus gain some benefits; it is more important to look at whose laws foreigners have to abide by when they come to China and whether joint ventures are conducive to China's socialist economic construction.

Second, the nature of this law can be judged from the main parts involved in it and their respective positions in implementing this law. The joint venture law involves three main parts: 1) foreign partners; 2) Chinese partners; 3) the Chinese state organ in charge of examining and approving these joint ventures. Who among these three main parts holds the leading position when the joint venture law is implemented? In other words, when a Chinese-foreign joint venture is set up, in whose hands is the final decisionmaking power? Viewed from the investment, the decision seems to be made by both of the investing sides; while viewed from whether a joint venture can be set up, we find that the approving organ holds the leading position among the three main parts. The state only allows foreign investors to make their choice within a specified sphere, and it has the right to examine agreements, contracts and regulations of every proposed joint venture and strictly strike out the terms which will harm our state interests. Foreign partners have the right to decide whether they should invest; but the decisionmaking power for setting up a joint venture is held neither by foreign partners nor by Chinese partners but by the department concerned of the Chinese Government.

Third, the nature of this law can be judged from the results of its implementation. The joint ventures in operation have brought benefits to China's national economy. 1) New products have been introduced and gaps have thus been filled. For example, the Jianqiao Enterprise Co Ltd in Fuzhou city has produced heat-contracting polypropylene film which is a kind of new packing material. Previously, we could get this material only by importing it. The packing company of the Ministry of Foreign Trade alone imported several hundred tons a year. In the first year after it was set up, this joint venture turned out a product completely reaching the quality standards on the world market (including transparency, the vertical and horizontal tensile strength, contraction rate and evenness). When this product was sold in Hong Kong, users commented that its quality was higher than the same product made in Taiwan Province. 2) Modern technology has been introduced. The joint ventures have brought in some modern technology which foreign countries refuse to sell to us. In joint ventures, Chinese technicians and ordinary workers can learn new technology and operation skills. 3) Joint ventures can help solve the employment problem and invigorate China's traditional industries. Rattan weaving in Zhejiang Province has a history of several hundred years. People engaged in this trade once amounted to tens of thousands. In recent years, due to the problems of material and funds, this trade was forced to decline and many craftsmen could not but change their trade. Since joint ventures were founded in this trade in 1980, the problems of material and funds have been solved, many old craftsmen have returned to this trade, the declining rattan weaving trade has been reinvigorated. 4) Joint ventures can help state-owned enterprises to open international markets. The Sino-French Grape Winemaking Co Ltd jointly run by the vineyard brewery of Tianjin agricultural and forestry bureau together with French Remy-Martin Group has introduced advanced brewing technology and succeeded in making "Shenzhou Brand" white wine, which gained favorable comments at the Bordeaux world wine fair in 1981. Ninety percent of this product is now exported.

POWER INDUSTRY GROWS WITH ECONOMIC READJUSTMENT

[Excerpts] Since the 3d plenary session of the 11th party Central Committee, power industry workers and staff members have conscientiously implemented the principle of readjusting the national economy. During the period of national economic readjustment, the power industry has still maintained a certain growth tendency.

In the past 3 years, more than 18,000 kilometers of high-tension transmission lines of 1.1 million kilovolts or higher and transformers with a total capacity of more than 20 million kilovoltamperes have been installed. New generating units with a total capacity of more than 8 million kilowatts at 59 large and medium-sized hydroelectric and thermal power stations, including the Gezhouba and (Yaomeng) power stations, were put into operation. In addition, by removing regional restrictions in the use of existing equipment, 4 million kilowatts of generating capacity have been restored.

MINISTER DISCUSSES HYDROELECTRIC POWER NEEDS

[Text] China must devote major efforts to developing hydro-electric power in the next two decades to meet the needs of the nation's modernization programme, said Qian Zhengying, minister of water conservation and power.

In a recent interview with the Shanghai-based WORLD ECONOMIC HERALD [SHIJIE JINGJI DAOBAO], Qian said China could not depend on oil or coal to speed up the development of its power industry.

At present, thermal power production amounts to about 80 percent of the country's total generated energy, at the expense of more than 20 percent of the country's total coal output each year.

The minister pointed out that more than half of the country's annual increase of coal output would have to be used by the power industry, if China was to maintain its yearly increase of power production at the planned level of 20 billion kilowatt-hours in following years.

Qian said that was impossible.

So, she stressed, China had to speed up the development of hydroelectric power as well as an appropriate proportion of nuclear power in order to enhance its power production.

According to government statistics, the exploitable hydroelectric resources in China amount to 378 million kilowatts, but now only about 5.6 percent of them are being exploited.

However, the minister said, an overall plan on a nation-wide exploitation of hydro-electric resources is now under intensive study.

INTEREST IN AGRICULTURAL SCIENCE REPORTED

[XINHUA reporter's commentary: "There Is 'Intense Popular Interest in Science' in Our Countryside"]

[Excerpts] Beijing, 9 Aug (XINHUA) -- Since the 3d Plenary Session of the 11th CPC Central Committee, agricultural science and technology have been rapidly popularized throughout our countryside. As a result, an unprecedentedly good situation has occurred. A large number of agricultural, scientific and technological achievements are used in production, and peasants are combining their traditional experience in production with modern science and technology.

In encouraging "intense popular interest in science" in the countryside, scientific and technological departments, as well as scientists and technicians, are vigorously supporting peasants in their march towards science and technology. Earlier this year, the China Association for Science and Technology convened a special national conference on the dissemination of scientific and technical knowledge in the countryside. The conference decided that, for some years to come, the association would disseminate agricultural scientific and technical knowledge as its central task in order to impart to peasants the scientific knowledge and technical skills they urgently need. Associations for science and technology in various provinces, municipalities and autonomous regions have also made arrangements for the dissemination of scientific and technical knowledge in rural areas.

Many national learned societies, associations and institutions as well as their local chapters, research institutes and institutions of higher learning have organized scientists, professors and science teachers to conduct surveys of natural resources; to provide a scientific and technical counseling service for communes, production brigades and teams on planning and arrangements for crops and production; to give lectures on techniques or run study or training classes to train key technicians from among the peasants; or to go to production sites to solve difficult technical problems, pass on their scientific and technical knowledge or popularize achievements in scientific research.

Scientific and technical information departments in our country used to lay particular emphasis on serving cities. Adapting themselves to the situation in the countryside, they are now providing services for the development of the rural economy. Giving timely help to the countryside, these departments are providing peasants with the latest, advanced and applicable scientific and technical information. As a result, many achievements in scientific research have yielded positive results in grain production and the development of a diversified economy.

Thousands of commune associations for the dissemination of scientific and technical knowledge have now been set up in the countryside. There are more than 1,000 such associations in Sichuan Province alone.

The technical responsibility system in production and the technical contract system are new forms for popularizing scientific and technical achievements in agriculture. These systems are now being gradually instituted in more than 20 provinces, municipalities and autonomous regions.

The dissemination of scientific and technical knowledge is now in full swing in our countryside. This reporter has learned from the department concerned: Our country will build, step by step, a system of popularizing agricultural science, education and technology suited to our country's conditions, in order to make use of more scientific and technological achievements in agriculture, to promote agricultural development and rural construction and to raise peasants' scientific and technical level. A new period in which we rely on modern science and technology for agricultural production and rural construction is in the offing.

PAPER FURTHER CRITICIZES SEXUAL LIBERATION

[Article by Li Jing [4529 0079] "Do Not Take the Decadent as Magical"]

[Text] Lu Yao maintained: "Sexual liberation" is an inexorable trend in historical development. Western countries are more progressive than us in this respect. Sooner or later, we will also take this road." He took backwardness for advanced and the decadent for magical. That was really ignorant and ridiculous!

In some Western countries, an ideological trend of "sexual liberation" which is cynical and unconventional does prevail. In the United States, some people propose "open marriage" and advocate sexual freedom which is unrestrained by morality. Some people with breadth of vision really hate this idea. An American professor said: "In the United States and the whole Western world, people's unrestrained and free sexual behavior is like that of cats and dogs." An American sociologist pointed out: The United States has become a "disposable" society. People dispose of their cars and TV sets once they get fed up with them. A man or woman will dispose of their spouse when they cannot meet their needs. In such a society, some husbands and wives are like strangers. They do not cherish any affection for each other. Such a decadent and declining mood of the society has brought severe social evils to Western society. The divorce rate has risen rapidly and the number of illegitimate children is on the increase. Every year more than 1 million children in the United States are emotionally hurt because of the collapse of their families resulting from the divorce of their parents. Some people in the West who have suffered from the evil results of "sexual liberation" envy us the stable, warm and sweet family life in our country. Some people of insight condemn "sexual liberation."

A Western scholar incisively pointed out: "Some people call 'sexual liberation' love. Actually, it is only sexual passion which shows that they are barren and exhausted spiritually. Such sexual passion which can only satisfy the needs of their sensory organs will make them live an even more spiritually empty life." Therefore it is not at all exaggerating to say that "sexual liberation" consists of the retrogression of history, irrational brutality and is a stupid ideological trend. When we review the history of the civilization of mankind, we realize that with the continuous progress of society, the future trend of the relations between the sexes will be the true monogamy which manifests the equality between men and women and will not be affected by other social factors. The so-called "sexual liberation" -- corrosive in human society -- will eventually be thrown into the rubbish heap of history.

"Soldiers have their own love: unswervingly loyal and beautiful. They are sick of and fed up with all additional lustful desire." Comrade Guo Xiaochuan's poem has pointed out one of the fine traits of the Chinese nation -- being constant, earnest and unswerving in love. This is not at all feudal dross, but a brilliant crystallization of the spiritual civilization. We, the younger generation, should treat love seriously and never take the decadent as magical and let the sewage of "sexual liberation" taint our true and sincere love.

ANHUI ISSUES CIRCULAR ON COMBATING FLOODS

OW082205 Hefei Anhui Provincial Service in Mandarin 1100 GMT 7 Aug 82

["Text" of an "urgent circular" issued by the Anhui Provincial CPC Committee and People's Government on 6 August 1982: "Further Strengthen the Struggle Against Natural Disasters To Reap Good Agricultural Harvests"]

[Text] To the party committees and people's governments at all levels, the cadres and people and the PLA commanders and fighters fighting on the front of the struggle to combat floods in Anhui Province:

The struggle to combat floods in Anhui Province is waged under the leadership of the party committees and the people's governments at all levels in the province and with the PLA's energetic support. The party, government and army organizations and the people in the province, working together with one heart for nearly 1 month in a tenacious struggle to combat the floods, have won great victories. The provincial party committee and the provincial people's government hereby call on the people in the province to make persistent efforts, display the spirit of continuous fighting, further strengthen the struggle to combat the floods, seize well opportunities to rush draining of waterlogged land and planting of crops, and strive for bumper agricultural harvests for the whole year by every possible means. The following urgent instructions are issued accordingly:

1. It is necessary to continue watching river dikes and combat the floods to the end. At present, the water level on the Huai He is still high and heavy rains are still likely in the next few days. We should be prepared to combat still higher flood crests. All localities should further strengthen their leadership over the struggle to combat floods and educate the broad masses of cadres and people to overcome slack moods, keep morale high, continue to watch river dikes and consolidate dangerous sections of them, ensure the safety of all river dikes and dams through the floods and win final victory in the struggle to combat the floods.

2. It is necessary to seize every minute and second of the present opportune time in the current farming season to drain waterlogged land and rush planting of crops. As it will soon be the "beginning of autumn" [8 or 9 August], draining of waterlogged land and rush planting of crops brook no delay. It is necessary to mobilize all available strength to work hard day and night, rush planting of crops as soon as the plots are drained, make utmost efforts to grow more late autumn crops and grow them well in order to make up for the losses caused by the floods and strive to prevent a decrease in production in a year of natural disasters and to reap bumper harvests after the flood is over.

3. It is necessary to encourage the people to provide for and help themselves by engaging in production and it is necessary to make proper arrangements for the people's livelihood in the flood-stricken areas. The people should be mobilized to engage in diversified economy and actively undertake sideline production to increase income in addition to growing more late autumn crops by every possible means. At the same time, it is necessary to make early preparations for autumn planting. The party committees and the people's governments at all levels in the flood-stricken areas should make proper arrangements for the people's livelihood, further prevent and treat diseases and ensure the safety of human beings and animals.

4. The localities not affected by floods should consider the overall situation, strive to increase production and reap bumper harvests to make up for the losses in the flooded areas. They should timely gather ripened crops and strive to prevent losses or a decrease in production. The localities with large planting quotas should plant more late autumn crops by every possible means, improve field management and strive for more bumper harvests to support the flood-stricken areas.

5. All professions and trades should take action to energetically support the flood-stricken areas with manpower and material. The electric power and fuel supply for use in draining of waterlogged land and crash planting of crops should be guaranteed. IDEOLOGICAL WORK AMONG SHANDONG YOUTH STRESSED

SK310026 Jinan Shandong Provincial Service in Mandarin 2300 GMT 28 Jul 82

[Station commentary: "To Strengthen Education Among Young Staff and Workers Is a Focal Point of Conducting Ideological and Political Work Among Enterprises"]

[Text] In the new historical period, whether or not we are able to strengthen ideological and political work among enterprises in an effort to train the broad masses of staff and workers, particularly young staff and workers, to be full of ideals, morality and cultural knowledge as well as disciplined is a vital issue that has a bearing on the future of enterprises and the progressive speed and success or failure of achieving the four modernizations.

Over the past few years, the number of young staff and workers has increased on a large scale due to continuous retirements among veteran staff and workers, resulting in great changes in the structure of the staff and worker contingent. New hands have become main productive forces within enterprises. Therefore, the stress in strengthening ideological and political work among enterprises should be laid on doing a good job in training young staff and workers. This is a strategic task.

The current proportion of staff and workers near the age of 30 in enterprises across the province generally amounts to 50-60 percent. All of them were brought up in the new society and are innately good. Most of them ardently cherish the party, motherland and socialism and have a fairly high cultural level. In addition, they are active in ideology, have keen emotional senses, quick senses for accepting new things and strong minds toward making progress. A large number of young staff and workers cherish high ambitions and have the spirit of men of action. They are able to become not only the backbone of politics, but also the shock force of production. We must fully acknowledge that such outstanding youths account for the majority of contemporary young staff and workers.

Youngsters of this generation, however, have been deeply poisoned and frustrated by the 10-year disturbance, and there are arduous educational tasks in training. In adopting a proper attitude toward youth issues today, we must fully understand the basic point that they wasted a lot of time during the 10-year disturbance, but that they are indispensable in achieving the four modernizations. It is an unavoidable law of nature that aged staff and workers will be replaced by young ones. We must look reality in the face and hold ourselves highly responsible to the party, the country and our common cause to fully and properly understand the youngsters of this generation by showing concern for them, loving and trusting them and by enthusiastically educating and training them.

In educating and training young staff and workers, it is imperative to adopt effective measures and correct methods to conduct education on patriotism, collectivism and communism among them by coping with their characteristic of having excess compassion for others, poor mental stability and no social experience in blocking the corrosive influence of bourgeois ideas. Efforts should be made to conduct education among them in regard to patriotism, collectivism, communism, modern Chinese history, the history of social development and the CPC's history so as to enable them to understand the present and the past of the motherland and the fact that it is not easy to succeed in socialism. Efforts should be made to urge them to always bear in mind the past, to treasure the present and to look forward to the future so that they are able to ardently cherish the party, the motherland and socialism and to uphold the four basic principles.

In conducting education among young staff and workers, it is necessary to provide guidance and persistently conduct positive education, such as persuading them patiently and commending good deeds done by them, so as to bring into play the enthusiasm toward socialism of the broad masses of youths. [passage indistinct](?Veteran party members and cadres) should conscientiously take the lead in the work and do a good job in handing over their work to their young successors. Efforts should be made to hand the party's fine tradition and fine qualities of the working class down to the younger generation, a historical responsibility which the elder generation must fulfill.

ZHEJIANG PROVINCE DEVELOPS ENGINEERING INDUSTRY

[Text] Hangzhou, August 4 (XINHUA) -- The mechanical and electrical engineering industry in Zhejiang Province has grown over the past three years as a result of the readjustment policy and reorientation of service, according to officials of the provincial machinery bureau.

The total industrial output value in the south China province in this sector increased at an annual rate of 8.7 percent between 1979 and 1981, according to the officials. In the first half of this year, the increase was 12.4 percent over the same period of last year.

Over the past three years, the province concentrated primarily on the development of 50 kinds of mechanical and electrical products geared to the daily life of the people, and textiles and light industries.

Many integrated complexes have been set up in the course of readjustment, provincial officials said. This practice has helped boost production capacity and improve quality in order to make them increasingly competitive both at home and abroad.

There are now 80 export-oriented machinery plants turning out 60 kinds of export goods going to more than 50 countries and regions. The export of chain blocks, chains, three-ton forklifts and electrical meters accounts for over 50 percent of the country's total. Zhejiang can also export complete sets of small hydropower station equipment, air separation equipment and industrial steam turbines.

The export volume of mechanical and electrical products this year is expected to double the figure for 1981, which itself was 60 percent over the previous year.

At this time 70 percent of the province's mechnical and electrical enterprises have expanded their product range to produce 300 more new products for local silk, cotton, dyeing, foodstuff processing, bicycle, shoe making, garment and animal byproduct processing industries. This has helped raise the self-sufficiency and reduce import, the officials said.

NANFANG RIBAO HITS ANTI-INTELLECTUAL PREJUDICE

[Text] NANFANG RIBAO published a report on 19 July entitled "What Does Ye Zuozhou's Demand for a Transfer Show?" The report posed a problem which merits attention in the actual work of implementing the policy on intellectuals. The report stated that it is necessary to correctly deal with the shortcomings of intellectuals, enable them to display their good qualities and talents and to conscientiously overcome their shortcomings. I have the same deep feeling in this respect.

Everyone, including the intellectuals, has his own shortcomings. It is the same with the cadres from worker and peasant families, who have the shortcomings too. Intellectuals also have their shortcomings and weak points. The key lies in how to correctly deal with them. Some of our leading cadres, because their "left" viewpoint towards the intellectuals has not been eliminated, always overemphasize the shortcomings of intellectuals. They never see through to the essence and the main trend of the intellectuals who are willing to bring benefit to the people with their knowledge and technology, and have the will to build the revolutionary cause and the noble desire to win honor for the motherland. Therefore, ideologically, they do not yet regard intellectuals as an indispensable force to be relied on, nor do they make efforts to enhance the latter's initiative. It is very difficult to implement the policy on intellectuals if this fundamental question of understanding on intellectuals is not resolved.

Let us take Ye Zuozhou for example. Although he is very old, he still crosses mountains and rivers to survey hydroelectric projects, regardless of his sickness and weakness. His study of the dam and reservoir foundation "fault-parting clay stabilizing liquid" has singular importance for hydroelectric work construction. However, this famous expert was not vigorously cited for his merits and was not given support for his interest in the four modernizations of his meticulous scholarship at the worksite. On the contrary, they kept a close watch on his shortcomings and they were hard on him in all aspects. This, perhaps, is not a shortcoming in the method of thinking and leadership, but is due to "left" anti-intellectual prejudice.

We should take care of intellectuals while dealing with their shortcomings and errors, and we should sincerely educate them, help them and convince them by reasoning and paying attention to methods and the environment. In other words, we should take into consideration the special characteristics of intellectuals. Recently, GUANGMING RIBAO published a news report concerning how Comrade Wang Zhen dealt with intellectuals. The report refers to Comrade Wang Zhen who, in 1935, in compliance with the order of the party Central Committee, organized a railway corps. At that time, there were some technicians who did not keep their mind on their work. They wanted to leave the crops for the big city. How did Comrade Wang Zhen handle this case? He seriously criticized the incorrect ideas existing among the technicians, and at the same time he respected them and had confidence in them. Comrade Wang Zhen criticized the incorrect ideological trend of some leading cadres who looked down on the intellectuals, and set out a specific policy which stipulated their responsibilities, titles and treatment which helped give them responsibilities and rights. This moved and encouraged the technicians. Those who wanted to leave the crops in the beginning were happy to recognize their mistakes and entered their names for the crops. Comrade Wang Zhen's merits in showing concern and care for intellectuals are worthy as an example for and emulation by us and for leading comrades at all levels. I think that if some of the leading cadres in the Guangzhou chemical research department could have acted as Comrade Wang Zhendid toward the intellectuals, by respecting Comrade Ye Zhuozhou, understanding him, treating him as an equal, having confidence in him and regarding him as their own comrade and friend instead of being domineering, keeping a great distance from him and saying things such as "if people do not report to you, I cannot do anything about it," and "my name comes before yours on the list" and so on, how could Ye Zuozhou have submitted his report for transfer?

Intellectuals are reasonable. They are ready to accept even serious criticism based on facts. If we still adopt the method of setting a target of criticism, making trouble, bringing pressure and assuming great airs and being a cut above the intellectuals, lecturing and mocking them, speaking sarcastically, and regarding the merits of the intellectuals who dare to put forward their ideas on the subject as shortcomings and as a a sign that they are getting cocky, all this will not only fail to resolve the ideological problems of the intellectuals, but will also hurt their feelings. Are there not many lessons in this aspect in the 20 years since 1957?

Now is the time to eliminate the leftist tendency of anti-intellectual prejudice. Only after eliminating this prejudice can we really implement the policy on intellectuals and a great number of gifted persons emerge.

HENAN PARTY SECRETARY ON ROLE OF PROGRESSIVES

HK050621 Zhengzhou Henan Provincial Service in Mandarin 1100 GMT 4 Aug 82

[Excerpts] I have been deeply moved and educated by the glorious record of party member and provincial labor model Zhao Chune, as reported in the press and radio. There are also many cadres and peasants with the spirit and sentiment of Zhao Chune in our Baizhuang brigade. They were happy to exert great efforts and sweat profusely in changing the poor and backward state of Baizhuang. They include good cadres who have never asked for subsidy workpoints since the days of mutual aid and the cooperatives, and good peasants who have labored without recording time or remuneration. It is precisely because we have these progressive elements that the party branch has been able to do its work smoothly and successfully.

Previously, during the period of interference and sabotage by the gang of four, certain people were unable to distinguish between fragrance and stink; anyone who wanted to work wholeheartedly for the public was the subject of ironical remarks and attacks. In the past 2 years certain people in society, influenced by external bourgeois ideology, seem to think that socialism and communism are not as good as their individualism, and describe as stupid anyone who makes greater contributions to the collective and does good deeds for the people. We have always resolutely opposed this kind of queer phenomenon, and we have consistently and vigorously commended good people and good deeds. We have also constantly helped the masses to understand what is fragrant and what is stinking, what we advocate and what ought to be opposed. We have carried out an annual assessment and commendation of model laborers since 1970. In particular, we have vigorously commended the progressive elements since the third plenary session.

The autumn farming season is our busiest time. The crops have to be reaped and threshed, the wheat sown, the apples picked and transported, and the fruit wine made, while industrial and sideline production cannot be stopped. At this period even an extra 200 laborers would not be sufficient. What can we do then? We mainly rely on the progressive elements to dauntlessly lead the masses to work hard. It is truly the case that one person does the work of two.

Practice has proved that the great cause of building socialism cannot be done without the lofty communist spirit of people like Zhao Chune.

HAN NINGFU ADDRESSES HUBEI REORGANIZATION FORUM

HK110220 Wuhan Hubei Provincial Service in Mandarin 1100 GMT 10 Aug 82

The provincial meeting on reorganizing industrial and communications enterprises was held from 4 to 10 August. At the meeting, experience in reorganizing enterprises was exchanged and the discussion was focused on the problem of how to develop the work of reorganization in depth.

In his concluding speech today, Comrade Han Ningfu said that the most important task for our enterprises is to raise their economic effectiveness. The criterion for judging whether or not an enterprise has satisfactorily undergone reorganization is whether or not it has achieved good economic effects. While reorganizing our enterprises, we should also carry out technical renovations and replace our old equipment with new equipment, and thus bring a change in the situation whereby our enterprises are technically backward and poorly equipped. We should also conscientiously do a good job of training our cadres and educating our staff and workers in order to increase our intellectual resources.

"Han Ningfu said that enterprise reorganization, technical renovation and the training of staff and workers were not only the capital construction in our enterprises, but also the fundamental ways to raise the economic effectiveness of our enterprises.

In order to develop in depth the work related to enterprise reorganization, Comrade Han Ningfu stressed the following three points: 1) We should strengthen the leadership and perfect the system and regulations related to the management of our enterprises. 2) We should readjust and perfect the economic responsibility system in our enterprises. 3) We should reorganize the basic-level CPC organizations and strengthen the ideological and political work in our enterprises.

HUNAN FIGHTS LAW VIOLATIONS IN DISASTER RELIEF

The circular said: In mid-June, quite a few places in our province witnessed flood due to rainstorms, which brought about tremendous losses in life and property to the masses of the people in the disaster areas. After the disaster, the party and the government have, on the one hand, mobilized the masses to carry on production so as to relieve themselves and, on the other hand, have distributed in good time a number of relief funds and materials to the disaster areas. In addition, quite a few cadres and masses have donated on their own some money and materials to the disaster areas. This has shown the party's and the government's concern for the people in the flood-stricken areas. It must be ensured that all these distributed funds and materials are strictly used for relief purposes. All CPC members are prohibited from violating the principles by abusing their power; from using the relief funds and materials to ingratiate themselves with others, to get in by the back door and to do favors for their own relatives and friends; from practicing fraud and taking others' allotments by assuming their names; from squandering the relief funds in giving banquets; and from privately giving away the relief funds and committing bribery. All those who fail to observe the regulations will definitely be severely dealt with. Any discipline department, once discovering cases of misuse or private giving away of the relief funds and materials and committing of bribery, must immediately investigate these cases, seriously and promptly handle them and resolutely recover all misused funds and materials. No appeasement can be practiced toward these violations of law and discipline.

AFP: DALAI LAMA'S XIZANG FOLLOWERS RELEASED

OW081148 Hong Kong AFP in English 1130 GMT 8 Aug 82

[Text] Beijing, Aug. 8 (AFP) -- Chinese authorities have released followers of the Dalai Lama in Xizang detained since the 1959 uprising, which was crushed by the Chinese army.

A radio Lhasa report received here today said last June local authorities had freed 182 military and administration personnel previously held in prisons or "labour reform" centers for "rebellious and historical crimes" committed in 1959.

China occupied Xizang in 1951 and maintained the Dalai Lama's nominal power until the failed uprising after which the god-king of the ancient Himalayan kingdom and 100,000 other supporters took refuge in India. Since then the huge territory with its population of 1.8 million has been ruled as an autonomous Chinese region. For several years China has tried to convince the Dalai Lama to return to China.

The 46-year-old Dalai Lama still enjoys a great deal of prestige in Xizang and has reacted ambiguously to Beijing's call. He recently announced that he would not return as long as Xizang remained under Chinese domination. Last year, however, he congratulated Hu Yaobang on his election as president of the Chinese Communist Party expressing his "prayers for your successful leadership and prosperity of the Chinese people."

China's messages to the Dalai Lama have themselves shown some ambiguity and in spite of China's frequent calls for him to return it has never stated what role he would be expected to play nor whether he would be allowed back into Xizang. Last year China formally acknowledged an undercurrent for independence in Xizang and categorically rejected it in principle.

Radio Lhasa said other supporters of the Dalai Lama were freed in 1978 and 1979 but, it added, "it was arranged that most would stay and work at labour reform units."

The new measures taken by local authorities in Xizang conform to the national policy taken a few months ago to release civilian and military personnel of the Kuomintang regime, imprisoned since the 1949 communist victory, the radio reported.

YUNNAN HOLDS FORUM ON RESPONSIBILITY SYSTEMS

HK310636 Kunming Yunnan Provincial Service in Mandarin 1100 GMT 30 Jul 82

[Summary] A Yunnan provincial forum on perfecting agricultural production responsibility systems was held from 10 to 22 July. The meeting analyzed developments in the past 3 years, summed up and exchanged experiences and looked into new situations and problems that have now arisen.

"The meeting put forward the following six views on further perfecting the responsibility systems: 1) perfecting the production responsibility systems is a long-term task; 2) get a good grasp of solving the problems that have arisen; 3) set up responsibility systems for diversification and put them on a sound basis and promote the development of commodity production; 4) actively popularize various types of science and technology responsibility systems; 5) rectify and strengthen the grassroots organizations and perfect the cadre job responsibility systems; 6) strengthening and improving party leadership is the fundamental guarantee for perfecting the responsibility systems."

The meeting held that "at present 99.6 percent of the province's production teams have set up various types of production responsibility systems. By the end of last year the large-scale move in setting up these systems had been completed, and the work entered the stage of summation, perfection and stabilization. At present we should get a good grasp of solving various leftover problems."

The forum also held that "in the previous 2 years we concentrated on setting up responsibility systems for agricultural fieldwork. This was necessary. We are rather weak however in responsibility systems for diversification. The task of setting up and perfecting these remains very heavy. We must realize that, after solving their food problems, the peasants urgently demand developing commodity production to increase their economic income. Yunnan also possesses very good conditions and tremendous potentials for developing diversification; hence, promptly shifting the focus in setting up and perfecting the responsibility systems to diversification is the urgent demand of the masses and also the objective requirement of economic development. We must therefore, closely integrate perfecting the responsibility systems with implementing the production guiding principles, so as to bring into full play the province's superior features in diversification and stimulate the development of commodity economy.

"At present the province should get a good grasp of the following tasks: 1) seriously correct collective industry and sideline production; 2) promote diversification responsibility contracts and stimulate all-round development; 3) do a good job in the distribution of income from collective diversification; 4) attach importance to developing specialized and key households; 5) actively support economic joint undertakings of all types."

The meeting emphasized that "at present the tasks of rural work are very arduous. As in the cooperativization period, the whole party must regard perfecting the responsibility systems as the task of the whole party and concentrate efforts and properly strengthen leadership over it. At the same time it is essential to organize a powerful rural work force and send it into the grassroots to help the basic-level party organizations launch the various tasks of rural work centered on perfecting the responsibility systems, do a good job in rectifying and building the basic-level organizations, and bring their total role into full play. We must strive to make a new breakthrough in perfecting the responsibility systems."

YUNNAN MEETING STRESSES LATE AUTUMN CROPS

"1. The provincial CPC committee has pointed out: Yunnan's agricultural development has entered a new stage. In most places the masses' food problem has been solved, and in the future we should concentrate on developing diversification and commodity production, to enable the peasants to get rich as quickly as possible. The provincial CPC committee, however, has also stressed that the province is still not self-sufficient in grain, and its grain production is still unstable, so we certainly cannot relax grain production. Developing commodity production includes developing grain production.

"2. This year the province's spring-harvested grain production was lower than last year, and serious natural disasters have affected the spring-sown crops. If the late autumn crops cannot recoup the losses in spring-harvested grain, it will be very hard for the province to increase production this year; hence the leaders at all levels must attach a high degree of importance to this question."

3. Late autumn crops have always accounted for a certain proportion of the province's grain output. It is all the more important to cultivate these crops in a big way this year. The provincial CPC committee has demanded that the province strive to sow a record area to late autumn crops this year, and reap a harvest of 300 to 400 million jin in these crops.

(Xu Nanhau) continued: The provincial CCP committee has also stressed a number of points in agricultural production that must be grasped as early as possible. 1) Sum up experiences, and especially for this year, in spring-harvested grain production, and prepare for next year's crop as early as possible. 2) Make early arrangements for next winter and spring agricultural capital construction work, with the focus on small projects. 3) Attach importance to and solve the problem of vegetable production and supplies in the fourth quarter of this year and the spring of next.

Comrade Liu Shusheng also spoke at the meeting. He called on the province to do well in fighting natural disaster to win a bumper harvest, carry out careful mid-season plowing and field management, and grasp the sowing of late autumn crops. Concerned responsible comrades from all parts of the province took part in the telephone conference.

[Report by XINHUA correspondent Yang Yuliang]

[Excerpts] Taiyuan, 30 Jul (XINHUA) -- Shanxi Province has conducted large-scale training of basic-level rural cadres group after group at different times in order to enable them to meet the needs in the phased development of the agricultural production responsibility system.

According to statistics, more than 510,000 such cadres in the province have been trained, accounting for 92.1 percent of those rural cadres who need such training. After the training, a large number of basic-level rural cadres gained a correct understanding of the responsibility system, learned to use new work methods in the new situation and raised their managerial level. While inspecting work in Shanxi, a leading comrade of the central authorities said that this was a very important link in improving and developing the responsibility system in agricultural production.

Various forms of the production responsibility system have been instituted in Shanxi's communes and production brigades and teams since October 1980. However, a considerable number of basic-level rural cadres have not been able to understand or adapt themselves to this responsibility system. At first they were "at loggerheads" with the masses. When they could not hold out against the masses, they then refused to have anything more to do with matters concerning the masses. This affected the establishment and development of the responsibility system. In view of the situation, the Shanxi provincial party committee decided to hold training classes to educate large numbers of basic-level rural cadres.

Large-scale training of basic-level rural cadres has been conducted three times in Shanxi Province since last July. Through the training, participants have raised their ideological level and leadership ability. Those who once resisted the responsibility system have now become its supporters, and those who were once ineffective in running affairs have now become effective in this regard.

The responsibility system was instituted later in Shanxi Province than in other areas. However, because of vigorous efforts to train basic-level rural cadres, the responsibility system has been developing properly and soundly in the province. As a result, peasants' enthusiasm for production is running high.

SHANXI RIBAO EMPHASIZES COMMODITY CIRCULATION

However, in days of joy, peasants are also laden with anxieties. What is worrying them? They are worried about some of their products which are not selling. Does this mean that there is a surplus of such products? No, it does not. Our province has made headway in diversification and commodity production in the rural areas, but this is just a beginning. There is no overproduction of such products. Supply does not exceed demand. If this is so, then why are the peasants having difficulty selling their products? It is because our markets for commodity circulation have been clogged. The situation in many places shows that the markets for farm sideline products in particular have been badly blocked for the past 2 years. This is a very sharp contradiction. We must properly and effectively solve this problem without delay. This is a great economic and political task facing our leaders at all levels at the present time.

In order to iron out the contradiction, the party Central Committee and the State Council are now directing all commercial departments in the country to carry out reforms in the commercial systems. However, the reforms are very complicated and also involve quite a few departments. This is still a new task which we must explore and which will take a long time to accomplish. Of course, this does not mean that now we should not promote diversified undertakings in the rural areas until these reforms are completed. What should we do? At present we should solve the problem of commodity circulation according to the actual situation. A saying in this regard reads: "Only with free circulation of commodities and brisk supply and marketing will production output increase and agriculture develop." This is true. If there is no free circulation of commodities, it will be idle talk to make agriculture linked with society and to make it specialized and commercialized.

In order to grasp circulation, leading comrades at county and commune levels must study the theory of socialist economics and do their best to understand, master and apply objective economic law. They must make thoroughgoing investigations in order to understand the local natural resources, communications statutes and advantages in all fields of production. They must study often and know well the market situation for local products and keep aware of relevant economic information and price trends. They must have a good knowledge of state guidelines, plans and instructions on farm sideline production in order to meet the needs of the country and the people as well as the needs of markets so that they can continuously improve production in a planned way and not blindly make arrangements for production. Apart from this, they must spare no efforts in grasping marketing and must support and encourage supply and marketing cooperatives and other trade units in the rural areas to do a good job of commodity circulation. The system of supply and marketing cooperatives in the rural areas must be changed through full and democratic discussions and consultations between the leaders at the grassroots level and commune members. We must virtually turn them into economic organizations of the collective, which will directly serve production teams and commune members and take on the work of purchasing and selling farm sideline products, in coordination with workers and staff in the financial and trade circles, we must vigorously improve purchases and sales in the countryside and actively look for markets and customers to conclude sales contracts. By freeing ourselves from old ideas and continuing to get rid of "leftist" thinking, we can find more channels for commodity circulation, give full play to the leading role of rural supply and marketing cooperatives and, at the same time, continue to give free rein to the role of different collective and individual trades and other channels. We must do a good job of trading at rural fairs so as to market more farm sideline products and provide peasants with more necessary goods to meet their needs in production and livelihood. At the same time, we must educate peasants to take the whole situation into consideration and fulfill their task of selling farm sideline products to the state so as to make more contributions to the four modernizations.

The more rural production is developed, the more the contradictions in commodity circulation will become acute and obvious. A proper handling of the problem will accelerate the development of production; otherwise, it will become a big obstacle. Therefore, party committees at all levels must know how to solve such new problems and new contradictions and strive to qualify themselves to lead the modernization of socialist large-scale agriculture in order to make extraordinary contributions for welcoming a new high tide of agricultural production in our province and making peasants become affluent step by step.

INDUSTRIAL SITUATION IN SHANXI PROVINCE REPORTED

[Report: "Responsible Comrades of Provincial CPC Committee and Government Put Forward Views on Arrangements for Industrial Production in Second Half of the Year"]

[Text] Recently, the responsible comrades of the provincial CPC committee and government put forward views on arrangements for industrial production in the second half of this year and demanded that all cadres, staff and workers continuously grasp the work of reversing losses and increasing profit in industrial enterprises in July and August. From September to the end of this year, the work must be centered on upgrading the quality of products and increasing the variety of products, thus guaranteeing the fulfillment of the whole year's industrial production. At the beginning of next year, the work must be centered on cutting down input consumption, reducing costs and raising laboring productivity.

In order to carry this out, the provincial economic committee issued in mid-July "Views on the Arrangements for Several Major Tasks in the Second Half of the Year in Industrial and Communications Departments of the Province."

The "views" first of all laid stress on continuously grasping the work of reversing losses and increasing profits. It demanded that all the leading comrades of various prefectures, cities and departments go deep into the grassroots to help resolve problems that cannot be resolved by the enterprises themselves, and achieve some results. It is necessary to organize the financial, banking and revenue departments to help overcome some practical difficulties in those enterprises suffering losses and create conditions in every aspect for reversing losses. Enterprises which have been suffering losses due to the overstocking of their products for years should be regarded as no longer suffering losses, as an encouragement, as long as they are not suffering losses in the current year. Enterprises suffering losses due to policies must be defined one by one, and the amount of loss allowed must be defined as well. As for those enterprises which have been suffering losses not as a result of policy, they must also be defined and a deadline must be set to change the losses into profit. We must clearly discern the situation in enterprises which have difficulties in selling their products, suffer serious losses and cannot change their status in a short time, and be determined to halt production and switch to another line. As for those enterprises which are not sure at the moment whether to halt production or switch to another line and which have inadequate tasks, it is necessary for them to define the personnel according to production and transfer spare personnel for concentrated study and training. While grasping the work of reversing losses, we must continuously grasp the work in profit-making enterprises, further perfect the economic responsibility system, strengthen the work of business accounting, do our utmost to cut down on input consumption, reduce costs, increase profit and resolutely fulfill the profit-remitting task of the whole year.

The "views" demanded that we do a sound job in improving the quality of products and in increasing the variety of products. In September, all the industrial and communications enterprises must take an active part in the activities of the fifth national "quality month" drive and, centering on "striving for practical effects to satisfy customers," vigorously create public opinion and mobilize the broad masses of workers and staff to develop a mood of "it is glorious to manufacture products of fine quality" and "it is glorious to offer good service to customers." In September, all enterprises must mobilize the masses to conduct an overall check on the products of their own units and, in accordance with the problems found in this check, work out practical measures to resolve them within a definite time. As for those enterprises which suffer from overstocking of products because of their rough and slipshod manufacture, they must halt production and be straightened out. Necessary punishment must be imposed on the leaders of those enterprises. We must mobilize all enterprises to extensively collect the customers' views on their products through such channels as market investigation, forums on industry and commerce, serving as shop assistants and visiting customers. We must check the work of "three guarantees" (guarantees of repair, exchange or return of defective goods) and improve the work of technical service. It seems necessary that some enterprises in light industry, textile and machinery departments of the province must be selected to establish a regulated system of quality information and experiment with "quality information forms" in order to make collecting customers views a regular thing. It is necessary to continuously promote overall quality control and establish a quality guarantee system. The province must promote overall quality control and establish quality control groups first in nearly 400 enterprises which have been awarded for their products of fine quality by the state, the ministry or the province in previous years before the end of this year. The province must also start and perfect the basic work of keeping original records, testing measures and quality criteria. In the future, the quality of products must be taken as the main criterion to measure the work of a workshop, a group or an individual. Those who are unqualified cannot be selected as advanced people or advanced units. It is necessary to do a good job in upgrading the quality of major trades and major products.

We must continuously carry out the activity of "creating excellent ones." Every trade must clearly define one to three products and strive for creating products of fine quality in each ministry so as to reach the first or second place of corresponding products in the whole country. It is demanded that by the end of this year, more than 80 percent of the quality indices of the major products in our province exceed last year's level and, of 100 major products, one-third must reach the average national advanced level of the corresponding products last year.

"Views" finally demanded that by the end of this year, in addition to grasping the work of quality, we must also organize forces to set about next year's preparatory work and arrange the plan of next year's industrial production as soon as possible, particularly the plan of the first quarter of next year, so as to carry out production smoothly at the beginning of next year. We must also grasp the preparatory work for focusing on cutting down on input consumption, reducing costs and increasing labor productivity in the first quarter of next year, thus setting a good starting point for the work of the whole year.

TIANJIN REGULATIONS ON URBAN COLLECTIVE ECONOMY

SK031124 Tianjin City Service in Mandarin 0030 GMT 3 Aug 82

[Text] According to our sources, to promote the development of the urban collective economy, the municipal people's government recently promulgated specific regulations on the issues of commodity supply, materials and goods supply, business places and tax revenue of the urban collective economy.

In the field of commodity supply, the regulations of the municipal people's government note: Commercial wholesale departments should supply the urban collective-owned commercial departments with commodities which are approved by the authority to be marketed by them. Equal treatment should be given to the urban collective-owned commercial departments and the state-run retail commercial departments. Commodities in short supply should be rationally supplied to urban collective-owned commercial departments, and the supplied amount of such commodities should not be less than that to the state-run commercial departments. When a collective-owned catering trade has been newly established, various state-run departments should give it great support and appropriate preferential treatment. The methods of supplying grain, meat, fresh eggs and sugar which are needed in food processing should be formulated by the grain bureau and the second commercial bureau. Raw materials and fittings needed in mass processing and repair services which should be supplied by commercial departments should be supplied in a planned and active manner. In addition to ordering commodities from state-run wholesale departments, the urban collective-owned enterprises are allowed to purchase, within the limits permitted by policies, agricultural, sideline, local and special products and unsalable products of industrial departments at trade warehouses, rural communes and brigades, plants and other enterprises.

As for the supply of materials and goods, the regulations note: The supply of materials and goods belonging to the first and second categories which are needed by collective-owned enterprises should be brought into line with the plans of departments concerned. The third category materials and goods and the materials and goods belonging to the first and second categories which are allowed to be sold at markets should also be purchased in the municipality and other places. The municipal departments concerned should supply adequate fuel and electricity, in line with the practical demands, to urban collective-owned enterprises in order to develop production, daily service and repair service.

Referring to the business places, the municipal people's government stipulates: With the principle of conforming to the city planning and not interfering with traffic and city residents, various district people's governments should make overall arrangements and planning in cooperation with other departments concerned. It is planned that some commercial streets, [words indistinct] and traditional markets will be resumed and newly opened. The yards and places outside the enclosing walls of enterprises, establishments, government organs, troop areas, schools and churches can be used as market places. The municipal people's government also stipulates that the urban collective-owned enterprises which provide employment for jobless youths only are allowed to be exempt from industrial and commercial income tax for 2 to 3 years after they begin production and open for business. The urban repair and service trades should enjoy a 3-year exemption from industrial and commercial tax. As for the collective-owned enterprises in which over 60 percent of all employees were jobless youths when the enterprises were established, 2 to 3 years' exemption from industrial and commercial income tax are permitted. As for the enterprises whose employment of jobless youths is less than 60 percent of all workers, their income tax should be reduced by 50 percent for less than 3 years after being checked and approved by financial departments.

GANSU WARNS ON ATTACKING, ISOLATING ADVANCED

SK070935 Lanzhou Gansu Provincial Service in Mandarin 1125 GMT 6 Aug 82

[Station commentary: "The Advanced Personages Should Be Firmly Supported and Popularized"]

[Text] At present, when we undertake the arduous task of building the two civilizations, large numbers of advanced personages like Zhao Chune are urgently needed to lead the broad masses of the people forward. However, the problem of making things difficult for the advanced exists in many localities and units, thus seriously hindering the development of the mass activity of emulating, learning from, catching up with, helping and in turn surpassing each other. The malpractices of isolating and attacking the advanced really exist in a few localities and units. For example, some advanced and model personages meet with other's jealousy for making more contributions. Some are isolated by others for upholding principle and being brave in shouldering responsibilities. Some are attacked for resisting malpractices. Some are mocked for being ready to help others. Some meet with difficulties for turning out inventions and creations.

There are many reasons for such malpractices. The major one is that during the 10 years of turmoil, the Lin Biao and Jiang Qing counterrevolutionary clique calumniated many advanced personages [words indistinct] and imposed cruel attacks and persecution on them. The clique preferred to praise the smash-and-grabbers and rogues as so-called heroes and examples in order to spread rumors and evil ideas for them. This situation has not been throughly changed. Another reason is that many units neglected ideological and political work, and thus the idea of bourgeois individualism has gained ground. Some people cannot bear that others are more advanced than themselves and even attack and mock others. This situation should never be treated lightly.

We should thoroughly liquidate the pernicious influence of the Lin Biao and Jiang Qing counterrevolutionary clique, strengthen ideological and political work and support the advanced with a clear-cut stand so as to achieve success in the mass activity of learning from and catching up with the advanced.

NINGXIA RIBAO ON STRUGGLE AGAINST ECONOMIC CRIME

HK060607 Yinchuan NINGXIA RIBAO in Chinese 16 Jul 82 p 1

[Text] From 20 to 21 July the regional CPC committee held a forum on the struggle against serious economic crime, urging all departments and areas to sum up experiences, deepen their understanding, strengthen leadership and concentrate forces to investigate and handle important cases in order to lead the struggle against serious economic crime to develop in depth.

The forum relayed and studied the instructions of the Central Committee and reported on the struggle against serious crimes committed in the economic field in the region during the past 6 months. In this period of time, the CPC committees at all levels have done a lot of work in the struggle against serious economic crimes and scored preliminary achievements. By 15 July a number of economic criminal cases and clues had been discovered and a number of criminals punished according to law throughout the region. Under the deterrent force of the policy of "leniency to those who confess their crimes and severity to those who refuse" and the "decision" of the NPC Standing Committee, a number of criminals gave themselves up and confessed their crimes. Four of the criminals confessed that they had engaged in graft and accepted bribes amounting to more than 10,000 yuan. This struggle has played a positive role in hitting at economic criminals, educating the cadres and the masses and improving the party style and the general mood of society. However, there are still many problems in the struggle against serious economic crime and there is still a long way to go before it meets the demand set by the Central Committee. In particular, the investigation work on the important cases has made slow progress. Some party organizations up to now have not placed this struggle on the agenda and grasped it as an essential matter.

Leading comrades of some units just take command but do not go out to battle, and they talk too much and do little. This situation is due to ideological understanding not being properly resolved. Therefore, the forum urged party committees (party organizations) at county level and above to conscientiously sum up and check to see how they have implemented the instructions of the Central Committee over the past 6 months. Has the leadership attached importance? Have they adopted a resolute attitude? Have they taken effective measures? They should make a rapid breakthrough, and especially score notable achievements in the investigation of important criminal cases through summing up experiences, deepening understanding, overcoming relaxation of efforts and fear of difficulty, and removing obstacles and interference.

The forum pointed out that it is necessary to investigate important cases thoroughly to the end, no matter who might be involved. If those who are to be investigated do not have a correct attitude or set up obstacles and interference, or there are people who intend to give unprincipled protection to and shield the suspects, they will be dealt with sternly according to the instructions of the Central Committee by taking resolute measures. We cannot take a laissez-faire attitude which will affect the struggle's development. All units and departments must work in coordination and support each other, and take the intiative in providing information. Any problem which may arise should be resolved through consultation, and people should never put things off or wash their hands of the business, forfeit the chance and let the criminals escape.

Leading party and government comrades from the autonomous region attended the forum. Comrade Shen Xiaozeng presided at the meeting and delivered a speech. A total of 150 leading cadres of the party committees (organizations) from all prefectures, municipalities and counties (districts) and the regional organs attended the forum.

COORDINATION IN POLICY ON INTELLECTUALS URGED

[Text] The work toward intellectuals has been recently checked up on in an all-round way in our province by party committees of the departments, commissions, offices and bureaus at the provincial level and by party organizations of factories, mines, enterprises and administrative units in all localities. Through the all-round checkup, they came to know the state of affairs in the work and solved some pending problems. This action has been warmly applauded by intellectuals. However, some cadres, especially some leading cadres, still have a great prejudice against intellectuals.

There are allegations that "intellectuals are neither direct creators of material wealth nor laborers" and that "intellectuals like to make criticisms and comments and are apt to get cocky. How can they be reckoned among the working class?" Such allegations are obviously made by those who are still holding old views when looking at intellectuals.

After the smashing of the "gang of four," the party and government politically rehabilitated the reputation of intellectuals, placing confidence in them and giving them a free hand in their work. At the same time, the party and government pointed out: The great majority of intellectuals in our country have become a part of the working class and will play a backbone role in the four modernizations drive. Our country now has approximately 5.7 million middle-aged intellectuals, ranging in age from 36 to 55. More than 90 percent of them were fostered and educated by the party after liberation and more than 70 percent of them came from the families of laboring people. Most of them have taken serving the people as their life's objective. Many of them have joined the CPC, becoming vanguards of the proletariat. Intellectuals have made great contributions to enormous achievements of our country on various fronts, including some of the elderly intellectuals who underwent experiences in the old society, have long separated themselves economically from the exploiting class and have become laborers of the socialist country.

Politically, they have been educated by the party for scores of years, and have been tested and forged in various political movements. Thus, most of them have been turned into "old workhorses" to serve the people. Though they are old they are still doing all they can. Their spirit is really inspiring.

Some people also question whether the implementation of policy toward intellectuals is a practice of "following the expert line" and "putting technology in command." This is entirely the manner of speaking of "leftists." We must know that our country has now entered a new historical time for modernization. This is an unprecedentedly complicated and magnificent cause, for which there must be experts and technology. If we know nothing about science and technology, we will accomplish nothing and will not be able to achieve victory in the four modernizations drive. Marx said: "Science and technology are productive forces." That is to say, science and technology can step up the development of society. So our socialist society should depend on them at all times.

Thus it can be said that if the policy toward intellectuals is to be implemented entirely, it is necessary to thoroughly get rid of the baneful influence of the "gang of four," clarify some muddled ideas, criticize outworn concepts and eliminate the prejudice against intellectuals. We must judge new problems with new views. We must properly deal with intellectuals in accordance with the instructions of the party Central Committee. Generally speaking, middle-aged intellectuals take on heavy burdens in work, but their pay and living conditions are relatively poor. Therefore, this problem must, if possible, be solved. Like the masses of the workers and peasants, intellectuals also face the problem of ideological remolding. They themselves should conquer their own weaknesses. However, in the wake of the party's policies, leaders should first of all arouse their enthusiasm and pay attention to overcoming their difficulties in livelihood while imbuing them with political ideology. We must make them feel the warmth of comradeship so that they are willing to get close to the party and dedicate themselves to the people. The saying that the party has now gone too far in applying policy toward intellectuals is obviously wrong. As a matter of fact, what we have done towards intellectuals is just a beginning. We still have a lot to do. We are convinced that so long as the responsible comrades of the party organizations and governments at all levels personally take a hand in the work and seriously tackle all problems, intellectuals themselves will surely take the general situation into consideration. They must be reasonable and will not raise any unreasonable demands. Thus, with the coordination between the higher and lower levels, there will be no difficulties in carrying out the policy toward intellectuals.

SHAANXI RIBAO ON PARTY LITERATURE, ART WORKERS

[Text] While studying Comrade Mao Zedong's letter to the personnel in the literature and art field and Comrade Chen Yun's speech on the problem of literature and art, some comrades have mentioned the view of "writers being greater than party members" held by one or two party-member literature and art workers. After enjoying some reputation, those party-member literature and art workers have impaired their quality as Communist Party members. They do not obey party discipline and party rules, go against the four basic principles, publish speeches not in accord with the party Central Committee, put themselves above or outside the party and cannot accept any different opinions. By so doing they have created a bad impression in society, particularly among young people.

Another tendency was also mentioned. Some party-member literature and art workers have developed a decadent and vulgar ideological style of individualism, anarchism, chasing money, pursuit of fame and interest, and bragging and flattery. A handful of people even practice these evil things without any disguise.

Therefore, it is quite necessary at present for the party-member literature and art workers to strengthen their sense of responsibility to the party and party spirit.

Communist Party members engaging in literature and art work have dual identities. As literature and art workers, they must do their duty to society. As Communist Party members, they must take up their responsibilities as party members. To concentrate the dual nature in one aspect, it is to serve the people and socialism wholeheartedly. It must be understood that they are first of all party members, then writers and artists. The vast majority of the party-member literature and art workers have handled this relationship very well. In particular, some verteran party-member writers and artists have set us good examples.

There is no doubt that party-member literature and art workers must be models in implementing the policy of "letting a hundred flowers blossom and a hundred schools of thought contend." However, adhering to the "double hundred" policy is for the purpose of propagating Marxism-Leninism in a better way. It is absolutely not for the purpose of publishing speeches against the party's line, guiding principles and policies under the signboard of the "double hundred" euphemistically describing this as a "new breakthrough". To carry out the "double hundred" policy, we must, on the basis of Marxism-Leninism, create various kinds of literary and artistic works loved by the masses, encourage the writers to enhance their understanding of Marxism-Leninism, constantly carry out criticism and self-criticism, uphold the truth and correct mistakes and be sure to straighten out ideological style.

As long as every part-member literature and worker has good initiative in this field, the whole literary and artistic cause will march forward smoothly.

XINJIANG PARTY CIRCULAR GREETS 12TH CONGRESS

HK100745 Urumqi Xinjiang Regional Service in Mandarin 1300 GMT 9 Aug 82

[Summary] "The CPC committee of the autonomous region has issued a circular urging party organizations at all levels to conscientiously study and uphold the spirit of the 7th plenary session of the 11th CPC Central Committee and to greet the convening of the 12th party congress with practical actions. The circular said: "This year, despite relatively serious natural disasters, it is expected that we can achieve a bumper agricultural harvest. Animal husbandry and forestry have chalked up the best results in years. In the first half of this year, total industrial output value showed an increase of 8.6 percent over the corresponding period last year. An improvement in economic returns is evident. In financial income, the annual plan was fulfilled by 53.7 percent, an increase of 0.6 percent over the corresponding period last year. This is a situation not witnessed in years. The market is thriving. Commodity prices are steady. There has also been progress in cultural, education and public health undertakings. But we should also clearly see that our work has not been sufficiently balanced. Many problems remain unsolved in industrial and agricultural production, animal husbandry and other fields." We must basically bring about a turn for the better in the party style, social practices, public order and national unity. We must seek steady progress in economic construction and various fields of endeavor. We must fulfill and overfulfill various national economic plans for the current year in an overall manner. To this end, we must work hard and can never show the least sentiment of self-complacency or relaxation. We must uphold the spirit of the 7th plenary session of the 11th CPC Central Committee and greet the convening of the 12th party congress with practical actions.

This means that we must seriously sum up experiences, arouse our enthusiasm, work in concert, and push on in the flush of victory, in order to bring about the continuous development of the very favorable situation of stability and unity and of economic construction in our region and achieve new results. To this end, we must realistically do several tasks well:

"There are now 20-odd days left until the convening of the 12th party congress. The leading comrades of party organizations at all levels and various departments must guide the masses of party members and people to seriously study and uphold the spirit of the 7th Plenary Session of the 11th CPC Central Committee and also the line and general and specific policies since the 3d plenary session. They must conduct education on the 'four upholds.' In light of the actual conditions of an area or department concerned, they must make necessary preparations for taking practical actions to greet the convening of the 12th party congress." To greet the upcoming 12th party congress, we must work realistically and effectively and avoid acting for the sake of appearances. We must continue to strengthen national unity and unity between military men and civilians and consolidate and develop the political situation of stability and unity. Firmly carrying out the party's nationalities policy and strengthening education on national unity is an important task hitherto promoted by our region. Party organizations at all levels must put this task in an important place and continue to ackle it in a resolute and proper manner. Everyone must promote national unity and seek to strengthen the very favorable situation of national unity.

"To continue doing a good job in economic construction and various fields of endeavor, the autonomous region must direct intensified and proper efforts toward agrigultural production and animal husbandry. On the basis of bumper summer harvests, they must strengthen autumn field management and achieve bumber grain harvests for the whole year." The autonomous region must seriously uphold the party Central Committee's instructions on enterprise consolidation. It must resolve to properly consolidate enterprises, improve economic returns and fulfill this year's plan for increased industrial output and for profits handed over to the state. It must continue to pay close attention to financial income and take proper measures in financial discipline and inspection. Those problems found in an inspection must be seriously handled. Those sums that should be handed over to the state must be treated accordingly. Financial discipline must be strictly enforced. Those departments concerned must make proper arrangements for production, supply and sales and properly arrange for the lives of people of all nationalities. They must further raise people's awareness of the struggle to crack down on serious crimes in the economic field. They must pay close attention to the handling of big and important cases.

We must carry on and develop the party's fine traditions and its fine style, further strengthen party building, and improve the party's work style. We must turn party organizations at all levels of the whole region into a leadership core or a strong bastion that leads the people of all nationalities in carrying out modernization. To continuously do a good job in building socialist spiritual civilization, we must launch a "five stresses and four beauties" campaign. We must raise the political and ideological consciousness of cadres of people of all nationalities and direct all the enthusiasm of the masses of cadres and people toward modernization, so that they can do their work and make major new contributions toward the further development of the very favorable situation in our region.

PRFSIDENT CHIANG LAUDS NATIONAL SEMINAR RESULTS

OW101435 Taipei CNA in English 1332 GMT 10 Aug 82

In giving his comments on the conclusions of the panel disucssions, President Chiang said that the current basic national policy is to defeat communists by accomplishing the national recovery under the three principles of the people. This basic policy has been set since this republic was founded 71 yeras ago. Since then all the efforts by the Chinese people's government are aimed at implementing the three principles. "Through various difficulties, we have defeated all enemies by joint efforts under the three principles."

President Chiang expressed his belief that as we are firmly sticking to the basic national policy, we will surely win the final victory in the anti-communist mainland recovery mission.

The nation became stronger and made progress in various fields after the government completed the northward expedition in 1928 under the guidance of the three principles of the people. The Japanese warlords launched an all-out aggressive war against the China mainland in 1937 for fear of China's growing strength. With determination and perseverance, we finally won the war and defended national freedom and independence. After the resistance war against Japan, the National Assembly was convened to promulgate the constitution for carrying out the democratic policy and the accomplishment of the principle of democracy in the country.

The most unfortunate fact is that the Chinese Communists staged an open rebellion against the government and occupied the mainland in 1949. During the past decades, millions of our compatriots there suffered under slavery and the beautiful lands were polluted with the Marxism-Leninism poison, the president said. Only if the Chinese Communist tyrannical rulers are eliminated will we finish our responsibility for the nation, President Chiang stressed.

The rapid development and prosperity on this national recovery bastion through the implementation of the three principles of the people has actually proved the superiority of the principles. The achievements in the Taiwan area has further supported our belief that the three principles of the people is the only guide in the struggle for the final recovery of the Chinese mainland. "Our basic anti-communist national policy has helped this nation stand firm in the world under the impacts of storms and high waves during the past years," President Chiang pointed out.

PRESIDENT GREETS ACADEMIA SINICA CONFERENCE

OW191439 Taipei CNA in English 1352 GMt 19 Jul 82

[Text] Taipei, July 19 (CNA) -- President Chiang Ching-kuo Monday stressed the essence of Chinese culture as humanism based on the Confucian theory and spirit, and he called on the intellectuals to shoulder the duty of glorifying justice and righteousness so as to accomplish the task of building a great commonwealth.

In a written message to the opening of the 15th Academia Sinica conference, the president said that since its inauguration 54 years ago, Academia Sinica has continued to lead the academic elites of the nation in doing research, thus making great contributions to the achievements in the fields of humanity, industrial technology and social sciences. President Chiang expressed appreciations to the members and other staff of Academia Sinica for their efforts in expanding the scope and quality of research and in coordinating the academic research with the national reconstruction work.

The basic prupose of academic research is to seek truth and attain the goal of promoting human welfare and world peace.

The president said the accumulation of knowledge is aimed at pushing forward human civilization in order to move toward the ideal of perfection. However, he pointed out that from the beginning of this century, the evil theory of Marxism-Leninism has created troubles and uncertainties in the world. The president expressed the hope the intellectuals should open their minds and sparkle their wisdom with a view to finding the answers for the puzzles of thinking so that the truth of academic research can correct the wrongdoing, giving impetus to the promotion of welfare and world peace for the human beings.

Since ancient time, the president said, intellectuals have shared a common ambition of creating a central thinking for the world, producing lives for the human beings, prolonging academic achievements of the past scholars, and opening up an everlasting peace for the future generations. He pointed out that the three principles of the people created by Dr Sun Yat-sen symbolizes the heritage of Chinese culture and glorifies the great road leading toward great commonwealth.

The president asked the participants to serve as leaders of wisdom and bravery in finding a way out for this age of turmoil at a time when this nation is pursuing the historical task of recovering the mainland under the three principles of the people.

PAI HSING ON FATE OF JIANG QING, 'GANG OF FOUR'

HK041230 Hong Kong PAI HSING in Chinese No 29, 1 Aug 82 pp 25-26

[Article by PAI HSING reporter: "Jiang Qing Watches World Cup Soccer Match in Qincheng Prison -- An Inquiry Into the Life of the 'Gang of Four' in Prison"]

[Text] [foreward] As the televised shot of Jiang Qing's bluster at the trial of the "gang of four" is still within living memory, we are surprised to learn that this woman who dreamed of becoming an empress was able to watch the televised World Cup soccer match just like the broad masses of residents on the Chinese mainland. We wonder whether she shouted "good shot" when she watched the match with keen interest!

The CPC Decided To Leave Them in Jail Until Their Natural Death

More than 1 and 1/2 years have elapsed since the final judgment was pronounced by the Supreme People's Court on 25 January 1981 on the counterrevolutionary crimes of the "gang of four," namely, Jiang Qing, Zhang Chunqiao, Wang Hongwen and Yao Wenyuan. Of them, Wang Hongwen was sentenced to life imprisonment and Yao Wenyuan was sentenced to 20 years' imprisonment. Of course, there is no question about their serving the prison sentences continuously in Beijing's Qincheng Prison. However, as Jiang Qing and Zhang Chunqiao were sentenced to death with a 2-year reprieve, and as the 2-year reprieve will expire in less than 6 months, it is questionable whether they will continue to remain in prison. The mass media are interested in studying the question of whether they will be executed or not.

People are also interested in the living conditions of the "gang of four" in Qincheng Prison. For example, it is rumored in Hong Kong that Jiang Qing was transferred to a prison in the southern part of China and that she made cloth dolls in the prison. People are rather interested in the life of the "gang of four" in prison.

A person who has returned to Hong Kong after a recent visit to Beijing, and who declined to be named, told this reporter: At the conclusion of his important report made at a plenary meeting of the national committee of the All-China Federation of Literary and Art Circles in late June this year, Wang Renzhong, member of the Secretariat of the CPC Central Committee and head of the Propaganda Department, said in a "stroke-of-genius" tone: "I have some grapevine news to impart to you." One item of the "grapevine news" was about the "gang of four."

Wang Renzhong said: Should we execute the "gang of four" or not? Many people in China, including myself, have called for executing them. However, in accordance with the opinion of the party (this refers to the opinion of the CPC Central Committee), they will not be executed, but will be locked up in jail until their natural death. According to another source, Wang Renzhong visited Qincheng Prison in June to acquaint himself with the living conditions of the "gang of four" and followers of Lin Biao including Chen Boda. He also looked at Jiang, Zhang, Wang and Yao through the viewing windows of their rooms in the prison.

The CPC Central Committee had discussed the issue of whether to execute the "gang of four." In particular, it had discussed ways to handle Jiang Qing and Zhang Chunqiao when their 2-year reprieves expire. In the end, Chen Yun made a "solemn pledge."

Chen Yun noted: Judging from the overall situation of the "Cultural Revolution," we can see that it was a political struggle after all. Therefore, with the exception of making separate arrangements to deal with some conspirators and careerists, we must adopt the methods of political struggle to deal with other people connected with the "Cultural Revolution." In other words, in handling all matters concerned, we must adopt an overall point of view and proceed from the supreme and long-term interests of the party.

How are we to successfully proceed from an overall point of view and from the supreme and long-term interests of the party?

Hu Yaobang later made known his position regarding this: "In handling the case of the Lin Biao and Jiang Qing counterrevolutionary cliques, we regard Comrade Chen Yun's opinion as the whole party's guiding principle."

The Life of the "Gang of Four" in Qincheng

What is the true picture of the life of the "gang of four" in Qincheng Prison? Without the Central Committee's permission to carry out an on-the-spot report of their living conditions, it is almost impossible to have precise information about their living conditions, and requesting the permission to do so is unrealistic under the situation in which the country is under the dictatorship of the proletariat. The only available channel is to fish for information from responsible officials of the CPC. There are two prerequisites for doing this: first, lucky chance; second, such a responsible official of the CPC must have a relatively high level of understanding and must dare to explain the situation in accordance with policies.

The aforesaid person who declined to be named actually had a "heaven-sent good opportunity" to talk to a responsible CPC official with a rather high level of understanding. The following is their dialogue:

Question: "What are you able to tell me about the living conditions of Jiang Qing and others in Qincheng Prision?"

Answer: "They live very well."

Question: "Can they read newspapers?"

Answer: "Yes, they can."

Question: "Can they read books?"

Answer: "Yes, they can."

Question: "Do you mean that they can read any books, or that they can read only the works of Marx, Lenin and Mao?"

Answer: "They make a list of books first. After the list is examined and approved, they are given the books they want."

Question: "Can they listen to radio programs?"

Answer: "They can listen to some radio programs."

Question: "Can they watch television?"

Answer: "Yes, they can."

Question (in a loud voice): "What? Do you mean they can actually watch television? Does this mean that they watched the World Cup soccer match?"

Answer: "Of course, they did! In short, we cannot use the methods which they used to deal with us to deal with them."

Question: "Do they have to participate in manual labor in that place?"

Answer: "No, they do not. However, they have to clean and tidy up their own living areas."

Question: "Can they communicate with the outside world by letter?"

Answer: "According to regulations, they can do so."

Question: "Can they receive their family members?"

Answer: "According to regulations, any person who has been given a prison sentence can

Question: "A Hong Kong press report said that Jiang Qing made cloth dolls in the prison. Is this fact?"

Answer: "No reporter has visited Qincheng."

Question: "It seems that your use of the methods of political struggle to deal with them is really too lenient."

Answer: "Nevertheless, they cannot escape their due responsibility for their criminal offenses."

Question: "Jiang Qing and Zhang Chunqiao were sentenced to death with a 2-year reprieve and the 2-year reprieve will soon expire. According to Chen Yun's talk, they will be leniently handled. When the 2-year reprieve expires, will they be given another 2-year reprieve (note: because this is the CPC's usual practice) or will their death sentences be changed to life imprisonment?"

Answer: "This will depend on the decision of the Supreme People's Court and the approval of the NPC Standing Committee."

Question: "Have you carried out education to reform them?"

Answer: "Do you think these people will accept education?" (The two looked at each other and smiled. The dialogue ended at this point.)

The Four People Differ From One Another in Their Behavior

According to an unofficial source, with regard to the behavior of the "gang of four" in Qincheng Prison, Yao Wenyuan has shown the most outstanding attitude to admit his guilt. There are several reasons for this: One is the fact that because Yao was sentenced to a prison term of a certain length, he is not one of those who will be "left in jail until their natural death." The other reason is that many Chinese scholars are "spineless" people and are good at trimming their sails, and Yao is no exception. Therefore, Yao behaves as if he is willing to turn over a new leaf. Yao's behavior is also somewhat connected with the demand made by his family members. Following the judgment, Yao's family members met him many times in Qincheng and encouraged him to actively strive for his release from prison at an early date.

In addition to Yao Wenyuan, Wang Hongwen is relatively tame.

Jiang Qing is adopting the same arrogant attitude she adopted during the trial. Wang Renzhong mentioned this to members of the national committee of the All-China Federation of Literary and Art Circles, saying: "Jiang Qing has estimated that we would not dare to execute her." It seems that Jiang Qing has made a correct estimate. However, of the four members of the "gang of four," Jiang Qing encountered the most tragic family incident: During the "Cultural Revolution," Jiang Qing's only daughter Li Ne, who held high rank because of her mother, was once the chief editor of JIEFANGJUN BAO and showed the supreme arrogance of a person with great power. It is said that Li Ne went insane following the smashing of the "gang of four," and is currently recuperating in a psychiatric hospital. Therefore, the part of this article which mentions that "some people have no family members to receive" could refer to Jiang Qing.

Zhang Chunqiao is as incorrigibly obstinate as Jiang Qing. According to a report, Zhang's daughter in Shanghai once visited Zhang. In front of his daughter, Zhang broke his "silence." Of course, what he said to his daughter could not have been fine words.

The ordinary people on the Chinese mainland have a lot of complaints about the fact that the "gang of four" are rolling in clover in prison. Criminals on the mainland who have been sentenced to reform through labor still have to recite that "people can be reformed" (a quotation from the "Quotations From Chairman Mao Zedong.") Such people are still receiving reform in a law-abiding way. If they know that Mao Zedong's darling wife has taken real action to negate this thesis of Mao, what would be their reflections?

It seems that this question will only be answered when some people write the "history of the proletarian dictatorship."

PRC 'LEAKING' PLANS REGARDING HONG KONG'S FUTURE

HK110050 Hong Kong HONG KONG STANDARD in English 11 Aug 82 pp 1, 16

[Article by Terry Cheng: "China Leaking Lease Plans"]

[Text] Middle-ranking officials of China-affiliated organisations here have been informed recently of Beijing's plan for administering Hong Kong, which includes the appointment or election of a local Chinese to be the chief administrator, it was reliably learnt yesterday. And these officials are allowed to relay the plan to their associates, speaking from "a personal point of view."

Coupled with the leakage of news concerning Hong Kong's future to non-leftwing media by China-related people, the action indicates that Beijing is preparing public opinion for regaining Hong Kong's sovereignty around 1997.

A veteran observer of the Sino-British relationship, who wished to remain anonymous, said it might well be a tactic to forestall any possible British move that would put China in "an embarrassing position." Britain's move might include requesting that Beijing should either enter into some form of commitment that recognises Britain's legal basis for its rule over the New Territories beyond 1997, or take back the entire territory of Hong Kong.

The observer said acknowledging the legitimacy of future British rule was tantamount to recognising the unequal treaties concerning Hong Kong. It was impossible for the present communist leadership to recognise the unequal treaties, which the warlord governments early this century and the Nationalist Government had also not recognised, he said.

It is known that Beijing wants to keep Hong Kong's status quo in order to reap maximum benefits out of it, the observer continued, but the Chinese leaders will not betray the national principle of not recognising the unequal treaties to gain these benefits.

He noted that Beijing's strong position on Japan's revision of history textbooks was an indication that Beijing was very firm on issues regarding national principle and feeling. He said it would be a miscalculation on the part of the British if they thought they could make China enter into a commitment that hurt its national principles because Beijing needed Hong Kong in its modernisation drive.

British attempts to treat Hong Kong Island separately from the New Territories would not only be impractical, but also irritating to the Chinese, the observer said.

He recalled that in a meeting with Chinese leader Deng Xiaoping in Beijing a few years back, former Governor Lord Murray MacLehose suggested that "under British administration, investors should put their hearts at ease." However, this suggestion was rejected outright by Mr Deng, who said Hong Kong's success was due to strong support from China and hard work by the broad masses of Chinese compatriots here.

With repeated assurances to top leaders, such as Mr Deng, Zhao Ziyang and Hua Guofeng, the OBSERVER said, some British people were still not satisfied, and wanted to press Beijing for more.

He noted that in the later days of the MacLehose governorship, key figures like Sir Murray himself and then Chief Secretary Sir Jack Cater had spoken of respecting the Chinese way of doing things and their assurances.

Meanwhile, local diplomatic sources speculated that British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher, in her September visit to Beijing, may make "concessions" to China by declaring Britain will recognise China's claim to sovereignty over the entire territory of Hong Kong, and express readiness to negotiate the transfer of Hong Kong's sovereignty with the Chinese Government at an appropriate time. This would enable the Chinese leadership in return to come up with better terms for the British in the negotiations, the sources said.

They added that after Mrs Thatcher's visit, a joint committee might be formed to work on matters concerning the future of Hong Kong, following the pattern of the joint committee formed by Shenzhen and Hong Kong officials.

China's plan to administer Hong Kong, as reported by the STANDARD earlier, includes making the territory into a special administrative region, in which its external affairs and defence are largely left to the central government in Beijing. China will not station the People's Liberation Army here, and domestic affairs, including internal security, will be handled by the special regional administration.

Well-informed sources added that the future chief administrator of Hong Kong would be a local Chinese, either to be appointed by Beijing or elected locally.

The sources pointed out that quite a lot of news concerning Hong Kong's future was "leaked" bv China-linked people. They gave an example of a report in the July 1 edition of PAI HSING magazine which reported that Mr Deng had told a group of local prominent left-wing figures in Beijing in June that China would regain Hong Kong's sovereignty around 1997. The party vice-chairman's remark was deliberately leaked to the magazine by a leading member of the group, the sources said.

WEN WEI PO ON EAST CHINA SEA GAS DISCOVERY

[Special dispatch from Beijing: "Beijing Sends PLA Units To Help in East China Sea Oil Exploration, a New Breakthrough Achieved"]

[Text] Beijing, 7 Aug -- Drilling work was completed on the No 2 Longjing well in the East China Sea Basin on 24 July by the No 2 exploratory drilling platform of the Ministry of Geology and Minerals. Many layers containing gas were discovered. After an initial test on 4 August, the gratifying news of the discovery of natural gas flow was confirmed. This represented an important discovery and a new breakthrough in the general oil gas exploration of our East China Sea Basin.

The No 2 Longjing well was our country's third general exploration oil gas well built in our East China Sea Basin. From the end of 1980 to early 1981, the No 2 exploratory drilling platform of the Ministry of Geology and Minerals worked on the first oil gas general exploration well -- the No 1 Longjing well. The well reached a depth of 340 meters. Direct evidence was obtained for the first time to confirm the prospect of oil gas in the East China Sea Basin, as predicted. A compressed natural gas layer and many layers of oil-containing sandstone were discovered.

Work on the No 2 Longjing well was undertaken by the Marine Geological Survey Bureau of the Ministry of Geology and Minerals. In the process of work, energetic support was received from various relevant units in Shanghai Municipality, the Jiangsu prospecting headquarters for general exploration of oil, the South China Sea geological survey headquarters, and the Chinese PLA. At present, it is the height of summer. The work site has been threatened by typhoons many times. Work is rendered difficult. The masses of marine geological workers have fought hard and have overcome difficulties, ensuring the successful accomplishment of the task of designing the No 2 Longjing well.

U.S.-USSR START TALKS RECESS; NO PROGRESS SEEN

[Text] Geneva, August 12 (XINHUA) -- The Strategic Arms Reduction Talks (START) between the U.S. and the Soviet Union begun one and a half month ago, recessed here today. A press communique issued by the U.S. delegation says that the negotiations will be resumed on October 6.

Though the talks were conducted in strict secrecy, reports received here show that no progress has been made on substantial questions. Soon after the talks started, the U.S. delegation, led by Edward I. Rowny, put forth President Reagan's proposal on reductions in American and Soviet strategic nuclear forces to a ceiling of 5,000 warheads on no more than 850 missiles. According to the U.S. proposal, no more than half of the warheads, namely, 2,500 warheads, could be deployed on land-based missiles. The Russian delegation led by V.P. Karpov rejected the U.S. proposal, arguing that it would restrict the land-based missile forces in which the Soviet Union takes the lead but not the submarine-based warheads in which the United States has the edge.

A few days ago, the U.S. Congress rejected a draft resolution sponsored by Democrat Senator Edward Kennedy on freezing the production and deployment of nuclear weapons by both the Soviet Union and the United States.

NONALIGNED SUMMIT VENUE DISCUSSED IN NEW DELHI

OW102010 Beijing XINHUA in English 1507 GMT 10 Aug 82

[Text] New Delhi, August 10 (XINHUA) -- India, Iraq and Cuba have exchanged their views on the venue and date of the 7th non-aligned summit and stressed the importance of the unity of the movement to find a way out of the present difficulties, reported the Indian press here today.

Iraqi Foreign Minister Sa'dun Hammadi and Cuban Vice-Foreign Minister P. Toras called on Indian Prime Minister Mrs. Indira Gandhi yesterday and handed to her messages from their respective presidents.

The spokesman of the Indian External Ministry told newsmen that the practicability of holding the 7th non-aligned summit in Baghdad next month will be decided through informal consultations in various forms by member nations of the movement. He said that India would support any solution that would reinforce the unity of the Non-aligned Movement. Informal consultations would be held with a view to finding a way out of the present difficulties for ensuring the continued unity of the non-aligned movement and its cohesion.

It was learnt that the Iraqi foreign minister has told India that Iraq attaches utmost importance at the present critical juncture to the solidarity and future of the Non-aligned Movement. In the views of the two sides, the present problems of the Non-aligned Movement should be solved without in any way endangering the future of the movement and should ensure the widest measure of consensus within the movement.

DELEGATE ADDRESSES UN MEETINGS ON INDIAN OCEAN

[Text] Geneva, August 11 (XINHUA) -- The Soviet invasion and continued occupation of Afghanistan, the intensified rivalry between the two superpowers for hegemony in the Indian Ocean and the presence of foreign military forces constitute a grave threat to peace and security in the region and the world as well, delegates to a U.N. ad hoc committee said. The committee meeting, being held here since August 3, is making preparations for a U.N. conference for the implementation of the U.N. General Assembly's 1971 declaration of the Indian Ocean as a zone of peace.

The delegate of Pakistan, Mansur Ahmad, pointed out that the threat to the security of the states in the Indian Ocean region came primarily from "great-power rivalry and confrontation in the region, foreign military bases and military forces within the area or its vicinity, and all the doctrines which tended to justify foreign military presence of intervention in the affairs of the states there." The Soviet military intervention in Afghanistan "carried grave implications far beyond the region," he added.

The representatives of Japan, Italy and France all pointed to the Soviet military occupation of Afghanistan as a menace to peace and stability in the Indian Ocean region.

Chinese representative Yu Mengjia said that the main block in the way of establishing a peace zone in the Indian Ocean is the two superpowers' rivalry for hegemony and their expansion policies.

He said the Soviet Union's armed invasion and military occupation of Afghanistan, a hinterland state of the Indian Ocean, had seriously threatened peace and security in the region and the world at large. Its refusal to withdraw its troops from Afghanistan, he said, cannot but make grave adverse impact upon the realization of the objective to make the Indian Ocean a zone of peace. At the meeting, the delegates of the U.S. and the U.S.S.R. accused each other of being the source of threat to the Indian Ocean region.

KYODO Report on Beijing Talks

OW130114 Tokyo KYODO in English 0007 GMT 13 Aug 82

[Text] Beijing Aug 13 KYODO -- Japanese officials said here Thursday they and Chinese officials now understand each other better in the dispute over Japan's school textbooks after two rounds of talks on the issue harming relations between Tokyo and Beijing.

But the two officials of Japan's Foreign and Education Ministries quickly added that better understanding does not mean substantial progress in defusing the controversy. They said the Chinese were "very serious" in the talks held Tuesday and Thursday. Further details of the talks cannot be given at the request of the Chinese, they added.

China has officially asked Japan's Education Ministry to correct "distorted descriptions" in the history textbooks about Japanese military activities in China before and during World War II.

The Japanese officials -- Hiroshi Hashimoto, chief of the Foreign Ministry's Public Information and Cultural Affairs Bureau, and Hitoshi Osaki, chief of the Education Ministry's Science and International Affairs Bureau -- are due to return to Tokyo Friday.

Historians Rap Ministry

[Text] Beijing, August 13 (XINHUA) -- Scholars from the World History Institute of the Chinese Academy of Social Sciences denounced the Education Ministry of Japan for distorting history by changing the word "aggression" into "advancement" in censoring textbooks. The specialists on the history of Japan and the Second World War regard the distortion as "a signal that a few militarists are attempting to stage a comeback in Japan."

At a forum held here recently, Wang Zhende, an associate research fellow, said that the Japanese Government which started the wars against China never admitted that these were wars of aggression, preferring to call them "China incidents," because they regarded China as "a geographic concept" rather than a sovereign state, where troops could "advance into" at will. The statement Japan issued when it withdrew from the League of Nations in 1933, Wang observed, arrogantly declared that international laws and practices "could not be applied directly to China."

Referring to the attribution of the Nanjing massacre to the Chinese army's resistance in Japanese textbooks, Wang Zhende pointed out that this was "copying the excuses of the old militarists."

He said it was the gangster logic of Japanese fascists in the old days that resistance against their aggression was impermissible, and any action of resistance should be punished.

"What the Japanese Education Ministry has done today cannot but arouse our attention," Wang said. Another historian, Hou Chengde, is a native of Shandong Province in east China. He said: "The deepest impression left on me, since I began to remember things," he said, "is how my mother took me to flee from Japanese troops air raids and mopping-up operations."

Hou said: "I have reason to believe that a handful of militarists in Japan today still yearn for and look forward to the Greater East Asia Co-prosperity Sphere of the past." Several hundred million Chinese over the age of 45 could serve as witnesses of that period of history, which no one would be allowed to distort, he said.

Lu Yonghe, who studies Japanese history, recalled the disaster brought to the Japanese people by the war of aggression, which he personally witnessed while studying and working in Japan. "The fascist war of aggression did no good for the Japanese people," he said. Hou Chengde and Lu Yonghe also pointed out that both the Chinese and Japanese peoples wish to remain friends for generations. For the sake of this friendship, historians should tell younger generations the truth of the past lest such history be repeated.

Japanese Criticize Changes

[Text] Tokyo, August 12 (XINHUA) -- Famous personages of all circles in Japan have continued to urge the Japanese authorities to correct the mistake of distorting history. Shizuma Kai, chairman of the Japan Journalists League, told XINHUA here today that the Japanese Government should bear the responsibility of correcting the mistake of distorting history in the recent revision of Japanese textbooks. Shizuma Kai stressed that the problem of distortion shows the maneuvering of the rightist force in Japan.

He added that it is natural for China to ask the Japanese authorities to truthfully describe the Japanese militarist aggression against China. He went on to say that confronted with the issue of the revised textbooks, the Japanese people have also been aware that the problem concerns Japan's future destiny. He called on the Japanese journalists to make efforts together with the people in China, Korea and southeast Asia to prevent Japanese militarism from reviving.

Ryosaku Sasaki, chairman of the Democratic Socialist Party, told XINHUA today: "History textbooks should be based on historical facts, and the recounting of historical facts should be objective." The cardinal standard with which to judge whether the recounting of Japanese-Chinese relations is objective is the spirit of the Japan-China joint statement and the Japanese-Chinese peace and friendship treaty, he added. Sasaki said it is wrong for the Japanese Government to change "aggression" into "advance" while screening the school textbooks. It is out of "ulterior motives," he added.

He pointed out that the content and basic principle in screening school textbooks are decided by the education minister. "The government is of course responsible for this matter and will be in vain if it tries to shirk the responsibility," he stressed.

The Women's Democratic Club and other two women's organizations also lodged protests against the Japanese authorities' attempt to shirk the responsibility in revising school textbooks onto the compilers.

The JIJI PRESS reported that 50 organizations affiliated to the trade union of teaching progession lodged a protest on August 11 with Prime Minister Zenko Suzuki and Education Minister Heiji Ogawa, urging them to claim responsibility for and express regret at the war of aggression and colonial rule in the past and make them correctly stated in the school textbooks.

Hideo Den, representative of the United Social-Democratic Party (Shaminren), said at a news conference in the Diet on August 11 that Prime Minister Suzuki should instruct Education Ministry Heiji Ogawa to correct the wrong statements in the textbooks and as a further step dismiss Education Minister Heiji Ogawa and director general of national land as a penalty for their responsibility in this matter. [sentence as received]

Councilor Akira Hatano told the standing committee on education of the house of councilors on August 10 that in studying history it is necessary to develop the idea of pledging not to make aggression any more.

The Japan-China Friendship Association (Hokkaido) said in a letter to Heiji Ogawa: "The substitution of 'advance' for 'aggression' by the Education Ministry in screening the revised textbooks is intolerable because it is a distortion of history."

Suzuki's Aid Sought

[Text] Tokyo, August 5 (XINHUA) -- Some Japanese mass organizations today demanded that the Japanese Government attach importance to the seriousness of the textbook incident and solve it as early as possible. This demand was contained in a petition to Prime Minister Zenko Suzuki signed by Yoshimi Furui, chairman of the Dietmen's League for Japan-China friendship; Tokuma Utsunomiya, chairman of the Japan-China Friendship Association; Aiichiro Fujiyama, president of the Japan Association for the Promotion of International Trade; Yasushi Inous, president of the Japan-China Cultural Exchange Association; Toshio Doko, president of the Japan-China Association on Economy and Trade and Seiji Kaya, president of the Japan-China Society.

The petition said, it was regrettable indeed that the textbook problem took place at a time when the Chinese premier had just visited Japan and before the Japanese prime minister will visit China and all kinds of celebrations will be held to mark the anniversary of the normalization of diplomatic relations between the two countries.

Yoshimi Furui, in an interview with the Japanese paper ASAHI SHIMBUN today, said: "Now it is the time for Prime Minister Suzuki to make a decision to take specific measures in dealing with the problem-creating narration in the textbooks."

He pointed out: "Looking from the perspective of friendly relations between the two countries, this problem is rather serious. Although only ten years have passed since the normalization of the diplomatic relations, is it not true that the pledges against aggressive war and for friendship made in the Sino-Japanese joint statement have begun to disappear?" He warned: "It will be dangerous for Japan to refuse to reproach itself now. I hold that the criticisms from China and other countries are sincere admonitions."

Torao Miyagawa, director general of the Japan-China Cultural Exchange Association, in a statement today demanded that the Japanese Government immediately correct the mistake made in screening textbooks. He said: "It is only natural for the Japanese side to take the initiative and adopt an earnest and serious attitude in handling the shameful incident and immediately revise all untrue narrations in the textbooks." He said: "We should not forget that the present friendly relations between Japan and China are established on the very basis of Japan's reproachment for its aggression against China in the past."

HK130540 Nanning Guangxi Regional Service in Mandarin 1130 GMT 12 Aug 82

[Text] According to historical data reported by GUANGXI RIBAO, the Japanese aggressor troops invaded Nanning twice, in 1939 and 1944, and committed monstrous crimes. The atrocities committed by the Japanese troops in Nanning are undeniable proof of their aggression.

Beginning 7 January 1938, Nanning was raided by the Japanese planes more than 100 times. A large number of houses collapsed and numerous inhabitants died or were wounded. The Japanese troops invaded and occupied Nanning twice, in November 1939 and November 1944. The first occupation lasted about a year, and the second lasted more than 6 months. At that time, Nanning was under the jurisdiction of Yongning County. According to statistics, during the first occupation by the Japanese troops in the county, 24,346 houses of citizens were destroyed, there were losses of 26,978 draught cattles and more than 460,000 dan of grain, and thousands of people were massacred. During the second occupation, the Japanese troops killed 4,239 people. Among those who had been thrown into the concentration camps, the death toll was 6,269, the seriously wounded were 2,093, the injured were 10,248, in addition to 350 people missing. Furthermore, 14,428 houses were demolished. There were losses of 845,797 dan of grain, 29,967 oxen, 45,858 pigs and countless properties. The appalling devastation left the city completely desolate and dreary.

JAPAN'S 1944-45 INVASION OF GUANGXI REVIEWED

HK110612 Nanning Guangxi Regional Service in Mandarin 1130 GMT 10 Aug 82

[Text] Our reporter recently learned from the materials edited and published in December 1946 by the statistics office of the Guangxi government at that time on the investigation and statistics of losses during the war of resistance against Japan that between September 1944 and August 1945, the Japanese invaders killed a total of 215,197 people in Guangxi, and 27,183 were babies. The investigation and statistics on losses noted that between 1944 and 1945, people in some 80 Guangxi counties and municipalities were killed, including those killed by aircraft fire by the Japanese invaders. In coordination with the relief work, the Guangxi government at that time carried out an investigation to provide information on claiming compensation from the Japanese invaders in accordance with the methods issued by the investigation committee for the investigation of losses during the war of resistance against Japan under the Home Affairs Department and in accordance with the stipulations of the guide on investigation of losses during the war of resistance against Japan.

LIAONING SEMINAR DENOUNCES JAPANESE CRIMES

SK121003 Shenyang Liaoning Provincial Service in Mandarin 1100 GMT 11 Aug 82

[Text] On the morning of 11 August, the Liaoning Provincial Society of History invited nearly 30 history workers who are engaged in research and educational work to an academic seminar marking the 37th anniversary of the victory of the war of resisting Japanese aggression. They extolled the great victory of the war of resisting Japanese aggression, paid a visit to (Liutiaohu) in the outskirts of Shenyang -- a historical site where the Japanese militarists unleashed the 18 September incident -- and strongly condemned the crimes committed by Japanese militarists in invading China as well as the tricks of the Japanese Educational Ministry in distorting the history concerning the Japanese invasion of China.

(Chen Pingqiao), associated professor of the department of history, Liaoning University, said: At 1020 on 18 September 1931, Japanese militarists launched a surprise attack in (Liutiaohu) and assaulted (Beidaming) and Shenyang, thus creating the 18 September incident and seizing the three provinces in the northeast. From then on the people in the northeast suffered 14 years of enslavement under the Japanese militarists. Between 1932 and 1944, the Japanese army killed 67,000 patriotic people in the northeast. The brutality of the Japanese aggressors had rarely been seen in the history of the world. After the Marco Polo Bridge incident in 1937 and during the 8 year all-out war of aggression against China, the Japanese militarists trampled underfoot over 930 cities and killed millions upon millions of Chinese people. This is an ironclad historical fact that can never be distorted.

(Ni Zifang), director of the History Department of the Liaoning Academy of Social Sciences, Deputy Director (Ba Tu) and other history workers, including (Zhao Qun), (Wu Yuwen) and (Xu Xinfang), also spoke. They said: The Chinese people, guided by the Communist Party of China, carried out the war of resisting Japanese aggression and defeated the Japanese militarists. Thirty-seven years have elapsed since the Chinese people liberated themselves from the cruel oppression of the Japanese aggressors. However, we will not forget the untold calamity imposed on the Chinese people by the Japanese militarists. We are indignant at the recent distortion of historical facts by the Japanese Education Ministry. Under no circumstance will we tolerate this. Distorting the historical facts concerning the aggression against China means a revival of Japanese militarism and a return to the path of militarism. The Japanese people, who suffered deeply from the wars in the past, will not tolerate this, either. Only a genuine, long-lasting friendship between the Chinese and Japanese peoples can guarantee that the historical tragedy will not be repeated.

[Text] Belgrade, August 12 (XINHUA) -- President of Democratic Kampuchea Samdech Norodom Sihanouk, one of the founders of the Non-Aligned Movement, today asked the "great family of the non-aligned countries" to return to Democratic Kampuchea urgently its place at all non-aligned meetings. At the sixth non-aligned summit held in Havana in 1979, due to the manipulation of Cuba, chairman of the summit, Democratic Kampuchea was deprived of its legitimate seat in the movement. Sihanouk arrived in Yugoslavia yesterday on a four-day visit. He was accompanied by Vice-President of Democratic Kampuchea Khieu Samphan.

President of the Presidency of Yugoslavia Petar Stambolic and Sihanouk today exchanged views on urgent international issues, especially the situation in Kampuchea and the seventh summit of the Non-Aligned Movement.

During their talks in the Yugoslav town of Ohrid, they voiced support for the efforts for the earliest possible holding of the summit in conditions that would secure its complete success, TANJUG reported. Sihanouk arrived at Ohrid at noon today, where he was welcomed by Stambolic. Vice-President Khieu Samphan also attended the talks in the afternoon.

Sihanouk said that contrary to the views of its enemies the Coalition Government of Democratic Kampuchea is not a government in exile. He specified that its members live and work normally within the country where they govern free zones with a large population.

Stambolic noted that the withdrawal of foreign troops and the establishment of the independent status of Democratic Kampuchea is a precondition for resolving the difficult international crisis in Southeast Asia. Proceeding from these stands, Yugoslavia holds that the formation of the Coalition Government of Democratic Kampuchea with Samdech Norodom Sihanouk as its president is an important step to realize the above targets, Stambolic said.

"This is unacceptable interference in the affairs of the European community", the document stressed.

The U.S. extended its technology ban on equipment for the pipeline project on June 22. However, Britain, France and Italy have said that they would ignore the U.S. sanctions which forbids subsidiaries of U.S. companies or European firms to provide equipment produced under U.S. licences.

[Text] Bogota, August 7 (XINHUA) -- Belisario Betancur was sworn in today as Colombia's 77th president and promised deep-going reforms in economic and social structure and government devotion to national development. At a ceremony held at a Congress meeting, Betancur, who was elected president on May 30, called on the people to commit themselves to "social discipline", "responsibility" and "solidarity". He pledged an effective government, a stricter financial system and no abuse of public funds.

Betancur raised a white flag symbolizing peace at the ceremony and called on the anti-government guerrillas to join those who assume "the full exercise of their rights." On international issues, the president said that "the grouping of non-aligned nations, despite the wide range of ideological positions, brings together an immense community of states in the Third World."

He expressed support for moves to review inter-American cooperation and proposed a Latin American foreign ministers meeting in Panama later this year and a regional summit in Cartagena, Colombia, to seek a new orientation for the inter-American system. The inauguration was attended by delegations from some 70 countries, including one from China headed by Minister of Culture Zhu Muzhi.

HONGQI CITED ON ECONOMIC CRIMES, CLASS STRUGGLE

[Article by HONGQI commentator: "Economic Crimes and Class Struggle"]

[Text] We should, while fighting economic crimes, be aware of the fact that some comrades still hold obscure or incorrect views of this campaign and of China's present class struggle.

Some think crimes, such as smuggling, graft, profiteering, embezzling state and collective property are congenital defects of our open policy toward the world and our flexibility in domestic economy.

In fact, they do not understand our present economic policy, which has benefited our national economy and especially the agricultural and light industrial sectors.

Some economic criminal activities have of course occurred after we adopted the new economic policies, but they really sprung from the chaos created by the sabotage of Lin Biao and the gang of four during the 10 years of the "Cultural Revolution." This period was characterized by serious economic problems, signs of individualism, and anarchy, and destruction of the party's function and reputation, and of social norms and discipline.

All this and our lack of solid ideological work and effective economic management have resulted in an increase of economic crimes.

In dealing with this situation, must persist in our present economic policies, and keep a powerful crackdown on criminal activities.

There are those who maintain that we cannot say economic crimes are phenomena of class struggle, since such criminal activities are common to all societies and are unexceptionally considered anti-social. This is not a proper view.

Since its third plenum, the party's 11th Central Committee has said time and again that the exploiting classes no longer exist on the mainland where socialist reform has been completed but class struggle will continue for a long time. Our struggle against economic criminals, who sabotage our socialist economy, corrupt the state and party leadership and society, and are connected with exploiting classes elsewhere, is one of protecting the interests of the people -- the masters of the state, and therefore, is still class struggle.

Some ask: Since the anti-crime campaign is a class struggle of long duration, can we consider class struggle the most important work, as we did during the "Cultural Revolution?"

To take class struggle as the most important work requires that all economic and social activities be geared toward it. Under this theory, there were successive political campaigns in the party and in society, which included many differences in "class struggle," and caused great losses and disasters.

Class antagonism is no longer the major contradiction in China. The establishment of the socialist system has deprived our class enemies of the economic, political and ideological conditions by which they could maintain themselves as a class. Therefore, while we must be aware that class struggle still exists to a certain extent in China, we should also be conscious of the danger of losing sight of its real extent.

But why, other comrades ask, will class struggle in the economic sphere last long and become more intense under some circumstances?

It will take a long time for China to progress from abolishing classes to removing all the distinctions between classes, or to eliminate all hostile and harmful elements. The social, political, cultural, and especially ideological influences of the old exploiting system and classes cannot be cleaned up in a short time.

There is still imperialism and hegemonism abroad, and our socialist system is still not mature enough to have a high level of productive forces and culture, and needs to be perfected.

As long as class struggle still exists in China, the party will have to stay vigilant, to strengthen the people's democratic dictatorship, and to follow the Marxist class analysis.

AGRICULTURE MINISTER EXPECTS LARGE GRAIN HARVEST

[Text] DESPITE THE TWO EXTREMES OF TOO MUCH RAIN IN A NUMBER OF SOUTHERN PROVINCES WHILE THE NORTHEAST GRAPPLED WITH A LONG DROUGHT, ANOTHER BUMPER GRAIN HARVEST IS EXPECTED THIS YEAR IN THE COUNTRY AS A WHOLE. [published in boldface]

Lin Hujia, minister of agriculture, animal husbandry and fishery, made the confident prediction in a special interview with CHINA DAILY yesterday.

He revealed that Guangdong and Guangxi Province have both registered a better "early" rice crop this year than last, according to reports just available.

China's total grain yield in 1981 was 6.6 percent higher than in 1978, and all the signs indicate that this year will register a further increase of more than two per cent on last year's good result.

Asked how living conditions are improving in rural areas even with only a modest increase in production, the minister replied that most of the farmers who have become better off derived their income from sideline occupations.

All over the county, he added, there are 1.3 million nonagricultural enterprises collectively owned by rural communes. In 1981 the total value of their products was nearly 50 billion yuan.

The total labour force engaged in these enterprises was 30 million men and women.

Unlike land and other farming properties, the collectively-owned enterprises have not been divided in the wake of implementing the responsibility system. Their management is under the direct charge of the commune leaders.

The flexibility of the party's rural policy has met with tremendous enthusiasm on the part of the commune members, Minister Lin said.

While the responsibility system has been put into practice in the majority of communes, nearly one-third of the commune members have retained some kinds of collective production. Many find it too costly, or even impossible, to work individually in areas like the northeast where there are large tracts of land.

This is not only in sideline occupations, but also in operations such as irrigation, insecticide projects, food processing and the maintenance of farm machinery.

It is up to the farmers themselves to decide what work will be done by individual households and what they will do as a joint project.

When asked where the government allots the major portion of its budget for raising agricultural productivity, the minister answered that the biggest sum goes to scientific education and research and technological innovations.

And the government spent 30 billion yuan in 1980 and again in 1981 to keep the selling prices of staple food and cotton stable while raising the government's purchasing price in order to give the farmers incentives to grow these products.

CHINA DAILY: STATE STATISTICS BUREAU EXPANDED

[Text] After nearly a decade of neglect, the State Statistics Bureau is coming alive again, and is churning out information vital to China's modernization.

Reduced to a group of a dozen people under the State Economic Commission during the "Cultural Revolution," the bureau now has 23,000 employees, who produce monthly, quarterly, and yearly statistics on everything from foreign trade to the price of consumer goods in local markets.

The bureau has branch offices in all of China's provinces, municipalities, and autonomous regions, linked with the main office in Beijing by computer.

It expects to increase its staff to 30,000 before long, bureau President Li Chengrei told CHINA DAILY.

This year, the bureau will publish the first authoritative almanac of statistics on China, designed to give Chinese and foreigners alike an accurate picture of the nation's social and economic development.

"We call a spade a spade, and give both good and bad news, according to the facts," said Huang Hai, director of the bureau's systems and methods department. "And we will continue to play the role of watchdog over the nation's economy."

In 1979, China set up its first statistics institute, designed to promote the scientific use of statistics. Local institutes have since been established in 27 provinces, municipalities, and autonomous regions.

The bureau recently added two departments to do spot checks throughout the country, and is now formulating rules to ensure the proper and orderly compilation of statistics.

"We are making every effort to draw up a set of laws governing our work, so that our statistics can be guided and checked by laws," Li said.

Party Chairman Hu Yaobang met leaders of the statistics bureau last year, and stressed the importance of strengthening their work.

The State Council has also urged the bureau to improve its work, and to expand its operations to the country level.

BAN YUE TAN ON CURRENT ECONOMIC SITUATION

HK130818 Beijing BAN YUE TAN in Chinese No 14, 25 Jul 82 pp 3-6

[Article by BAN YUE TAN economic editorial office: "Better Than Expected -- A General Summing Up of the Economic Situation in the First Half of 1982"]

[Text] The situation of China's national economy in the first half of 1982 can be summarized into one sentence: The situation is fine and better than expected. The eight-character policy of "readjustment, restructuring, reorganization and upgrading" and the policy of reinvigorating the domestic economy and opening up the doors to foreign countries put forth by the CPC Central Committee have displayed their enormous might. The most difficult period for China's national economy is past. Our national economy has embarked on the path of steady and healthy growth.

More Than Half the Time Has Gone and More Than Half the Annual Plans Have Been Fulfilled

In industrial production we have fulfilled and overfulfilled the plan. According to statistics, from January to June, our country fulfilled 51.2 percent of the annual plan of the total industrial output value, an increase of 10.1 percent over the same period last year. As far as the products are concerned, apart from a decrease in the output of specific products as the result of the reduction in output according to the plan, the output of the 26 major products was higher than in the same period last year. Seen from the regions, there was an increase in the production of each of the 29 provinces, municipalities and autonomous regions. In trade terms, there was an overall increase in both light and heavy industries.

More than half of the yearly plan for energy production has been fulfilled. The output of coal reached 315.67 million tons, 11.2 percent more than in the same period last year; that of petroleum amounted to 50.79 million tons, registering an increase of 1.3 percent; and that of electricity totaled 159.7 billion kilowatt hours, a 7.5 percent increase.

The situation of agricultural production is good. It is preliminarily estimated that the total output of summer grain crops will be by and large the same as last year's total output, despite this year's summer crops suffering serious natural disasters. Up to 30 June, a total of more than 16.7 billion jin of summer grain had been purchased according to state purchase quotas throughout the country, an increase of 11.4 percent over the same period of last year. The industrial crops, such as cotton, oil-bearing and sugar-yielding crops and other diversified economic undertakings continued to develop. In the first half of 1982, a total of 1.9 billion saplings were voluntarily planted by the entire people and a total of 3.2 billion saplings were planted around enclosures. New successes have been scored in animal husbandry and the aquatic products industry.

Communications and transportation overfulfilled the plan every month. The volume of railway freight transport in the first half of 1982 fulfilled 53 percent of the annual plan plan, an increase of 8.2 percent over the same period last year. The volume of passenger transportation by railway fulfilled 52 percent of the annual plan. The volume of waterways transportation fulfilled by the units under direct jurisdiction of the Ministry of Communications also fulfilled 55 percent of the annual plan, 10 percent higher then in the same period last year.

Market commodity supply was more abundant than in the preceding year. Commodity rices were basically stable. The total volume of commodities purchased and of the retailing of social commodities registered an increase of about 10 percent over the same period last year. Some commodities which were scarce and in great demand in the past have been opened up for sale to the public without any restrictions. Many commodities for which supply has for many years fallen short of demand, have reached a state in which their supply is almost on a par with demand. In the past, the market was "a seller's market" and the customers could only buy whatever the shops had. Now there has emerged "a buyer's market" and the phenomenon has appeared whereby the masses "reserve their money and buy commodities according to their choice." This is a good phenomenon seldom seen since the founding of the PRC.

The situation of capital construction continued to improve. The construction of key projects proceeded at an accelerated pace and the total volume of completed investments increased by a considerable margin compared with the same period last year.

The situation of state revenue and the withdrawal of currency form circulation is satisfactory. Savings deposits both in urban and rural areas increased month by month.

Generally speaking, a sound foundation has been laid for realizing the goal of "ensure four, strive for five."

Several Characteristics

Apart from the characteristic that "more than half the time has gone and more than half the annual plan has been fulfilled," the characteristics of the situation of the national economy are still manifested in the following aspects.

-- The guiding ideology of the economic work has begun to change. That is to say, it has changed from giving priority to concentrating on output value and output to paying attention to product quality and variety as well as consumption and cost; from mainly concentrating on boosting both production and revenue to paying attention not only to ensuring increases in both production and revenue but also to ensuring an increase in revenue while cutting expenditure and an increase in revenue while there is a reduction in production; from mainly grasping the expanded reproduction by extension to paying attention to the expanded reproduction by intension; from neglecting the role of science and technology to attaching importance to the work of science and technology; and from concentrating only on production management to simultaneously grasping production and operations. In a word, we have begun to implement the principle which takes the economic results as the center and we have arranged and conducted the various economic activities centering around the attainment of better economic results.

-- Economic results have been improved to some extent. There were fairly big increases in the income of the enterprises from marketing their products through their own channels, the profits they produced and the profits they handed over to the state compared with the same period last year. From January to May, the profits and taxes handed over to the state by the state-run industrial enterpriese within the budget increased by 10 percent, approaching the growth rate of the total output value; the number of enterprises which were run at a loss and the amount of losses suffered by the enterprises in business decreased from month to month; and comparable production costs also dropped.

-- There has been a continued advance in light industry and a rapid pickup in the production of heavy industry. The production of light industry in the first half of 1982 showed an increase of 10.7 percent over the same period of last year. Last year's heavy industrial production was 4.7 percent less than in the year before last. The production of heavy industry began to pick up in the last quarter of last year. In the first half of this year, it increased from month to month and by June, it had registered an increase of 9.5 percent over the same period last year. Many heavy industrial enterprises have turned from "operating below capacity" to "operating at full capacity." The production of such strained and scarce products as thin steel plate, strip steel, dyestuffs, chemical pharmaceuticals, cement and glass considerably increased compared with last year and the supply of some products which were unmarketable in the past, such as thick steel plate, high-quality rolled steel, small-sized farm machinery and lathes has begun to fall short of demand. The pickup in heavy industrial production is a good thing. It shows that initial successes have been scored in readjusting the service orientation of heavy industry, expanding its service field, raising its service quality and improving its ability to adapt and also shows that the further advances in agriculture, light industry, the export trade and capital construction undertakings and the thoroughgoing carrying out of technical transformation of enterprises have set more and higher demands on heavy industry.

-- Although the plan for energy production has been satisfactorily fulfilled, energy supply has still been quite strained and become a key link of the development of the national economy as a result of the rapid growth of industrial and agricultural production, plus lack of carrying capacity.

Improve the Economic Results and Develop the Already Very Good Situation

The economic situation in the first half of 1982 was very fine but we must not be unrealistically optimistic, lower our guard or slacken our endeavors. We must soberly realize that the disproportions in the national economy cannot be completely readjusted within 1 or 2 years; some unstable factors in the growth of the economy have not been totally eliminated. Protracted, arduous and unremitting efforts are still required to ensure a fundamental change for the better in the situation of the national economy.

At present, there are still some difficulties and problems in the course of economic development. For example, there is still a considerable strain in the situation of the energy industry and communications and transportation; with the advances in industrial and agricultural production and an increase in the needs of the people's livelihood, the contradiction between the supply and demand of energy, and communications and transprotation will become more acute; the improvement in economic results is still far from satisfactory; compared with the same period last year, the profit rate of the output value of state-run enterprises decreased to some extent; there was a decrease in the quality of a fairly large proportion of industrial products and an increase in material consumption. Some products are monotonous in product design, size and color, substandard in quality, unreasonably high in price and unsalable on the market, and as a result of this, there has been an increase in the stagnancy of circulating funds; not enough attention was paid to safety in production and this resulted in repeated grave accidents. We must take conscientious and effective steps and solve these problems.

In the second half of 1982, we must continue to earnestly implement the principle which takes the attainment of better economic results as the center and ensure the realization of the goal of "ensure four, strive for five" in a down-to-earth and unexaggerated manner. For this purpose, we must:

1. Uphold the unity of speed and results and on the basis of improved economic results, tap potential and strive for speed. We must guard against and overcome the tendencies in which speed, quantity and production are given one-sided stress while results, quality and marketing do not receive the attention they deserve, speed is one-sidedly pursued and the tasks of striving for output value are forcefully passed down to each lower level.

2. Urge the enterprises to resolutely give first place to product variety and quality and ensure that their products are marketable. At the same time, we must ensure that enterprises organize production and allocate and transfer materials conscientiously in accordance with the state plan and economic contracts.

3. Continue to adhere to carrying out the principle of "six priorities" in light industry and ensure the continued growth of the production of consumer goods.

4. Continue to readjust the operational orientation of heavy industry, expand its service fields, accelerate the upgrading and replacement of its products, and particularly vigorously develop the equipment with a low consumption rate and efficiency which is needed in the technical transformation of the various trades and professions.

5. Do a good job in building and forming coordinated and complete sets of equipment for the energy industry and communications and transportation and at the same time further firmly grasp energy production and energy conservation.

6. Conscientiously adopt various ways and means to smooth out the channels of commodity circulation, further activate the market both in urban and rural areas, expand the marketing of commodities and better meet the needs of the people. Especially we must conduct a sales-promoting activity which is geared to the needs of the 800 million peasants.

7. Do a good job in reorganizing enterprises, improving the level of the operations and management of enterprises and effecting a 3 percent reduction in energy consumption and a 2-3 percent decrease in the costs of enterprises.

So long as we preserve a vigorous revolutionary spirit and a practical and realistic attitude, pool the wisdom and efforts of everyone and do the work in a solid, painstaking, thoroughgoing and meticulous way, we will be able, on the basis of the achievements which were gained in the first half of the year, to overcome the various kinds of difficulties in our advance, further develop the already very good situation, attain better economic results and strive for new victories throughout the year.

BAN YUE TAN ON VITALITY OF INDUSTRIAL ECONOMY

[Article by Gao Jie [7559 3381]: "The Vitality of Industrial Economy as Seen From Several Figures"]

[Text] Since the 3d Plenary Session of the 11th CPC Central Committee, while readjusting its national economy, our country has carried out a series of major reforms of the management system of the industrial economy. These reforms have produced conspicuous results. However, any reform will undoubtedly arouse suspicion and reproach, and particularly after serious economic criminal activities have recently been exposed in some industrial enterprises, there has been more suspicion and reproach on the reform of the industrial economic system than before.

Recently I have found several figures from the materials provided by the leading departments concerned, which will enable us to have a clear head and think over the problems.

-- During the 3 years from 1949 to 1981, although there was not a big increase in the budgeted profits and taxes handed over to the state by the independent accounting state-run industrial enterprises throughout the country, the proportion of these profits and taxes in the country's total revenue steadily increased. In 1979 these profits, plus taxes, made up 66.9 percent of the country's total revenue. They increased to 72.7 percent in 1980 and reached 74.7 percent last year. If these profits and taxes handed over to the state by industrial enterprises are added together, they constitute more than 80 percent of last year's total state revenue. It played a fairly great stabilizing role in achieving the basic balance in state revenue last year.

-- During the 3 years from 1979 to 1981, the industrial enterprises all over the country spent 10 billion yuan of their officially listed funds on building new houses, which made up two-thirds of the total investment (15.2 billion yuan) poured into the construction of new houses both in urban and rural areas throughout the nation. This is a case never seen in the past.

-- After the economic reforms, every year the localities and enterprises gained and increased their officially listed funds which totaled 50 billion yuan in 1981, 30 percent of which was used in technical transformation, tapping potential and innovation of enterprises. The role of the officially listed funds of enterprises in promoting industrial production will become conspicuous as time goes by.

-- In the first half of 1982, the profits and taxes handed over to the state by industrial enterprises were 5.9 percent more than the same period last year. There was a continued advance in light industry and a remarkable pickup in heavy industry and an abundant supply of commodities on the market, and thus emerged a brisk phenomenon seldom seen in the past 30-odd years.

Further probing the problems facing China's industry in the past will enable us to have a more profound understanding of the significance of the above-mentioned several figures.

In the past, there was serious disproportion in China's national economy. In carrying out the readjustment over the past few years after the 3d Plenary Session of the 11th CPC Central Committee, we met with a considerable number of difficulties. Our industry was confronted with three major problems which had a direct bearing on the income of enterprises. First, the number of staff and workers greatly increased. A large proportion of the 26 million jobs provided by the state to the people in cities and towns from 1979 to 1981 were for industrial enterprises. These new staff and workers' salaries, bonuses and welfare payments cost the enterprises more than 10 billion yuan. Second, increases in the price of batches of raw materials, a decrease in the prices for their products and an additional weight on their social burdens, such as insurance premiums and antipollution expenses, reduced the enterprises' profits by 10 billion yuan within 3 years. Third, the heavy industrial departments, such as machine building, iron and steel, and chemical industry were operated under capacity and as a result they lost several billion yuan. The increase in expenditure and decrease in revenue during the past 3 years in these three aspects alone amounted to 20-odd billion yuan. Under these circumstances, there were increases in the profits and taxes handed over to the state by industrial enterprises in the first 2 years but the profits and taxes handed over to the state by industrial enterprises in 1981 were only 800 yuan less than those in 1980. Obviously, it is hard to imagine that we could have such a stable situation without these economic reforms.

The various reforms of the industrial economic structure conducted over the last few years are, generally speaking, that we have broken down the excessively rigid management system and brought more vitality to the enterprises.

The most important change is that the enterprises already have some powers over financial affairs, have smashed the previous system whereby "both revenue and expenditure have their own avenues and nobody takes care of profits or losses" and have been "enlivened" economically. The profitmaking enterprises are allowed to retain a portion of profits according to the stipulations and use them to develop production and as bonus welfare payments for the staff and workers. The principle that "the enterprises which suffer slight losses in business are allowed to share part of the profits and no profitsharing will be given to those which suffer excessive losses in business" should be implemented among the enterprises which are run at a loss. They are required to turn deficit into profit within a specified time (excluding losses resulting from the readjustment of policies) and are not allowed to rest and depend for a long time on the "grain resold to them by the state." This not only gives the enterprises internal motivation to vigorously improve their operations and management but also encourages every staff member or worker to be "minister of finance" and calculate things carefully and budget strictly in all respects.

Furthermore, under the guidance of the state plan, the enterprises have a certain degree of decisionmaking power over production and marketing. This gives play to the supplementary role of the regulation by market mechanism and makes production and operations begin to become "lively." Take the machine-building industry for example. In 1981 the production tasks assigned by the state to the various enterprises under the jurisdiction of the First Ministry of Machine Building and its affiliated organizations were worth only 10 billion yuan, which was equivalent to one-fourth of the total production capacity. If we still stick to the conventional method of solely relying on the state's arrangements of production and the state's monopoly of marketing, then half the number of staff and workers will have nothing to do and will have to sit idle and live off state loans. Under the new system, last year, the machine-building industry enterprises were very busy and brisk. While ensuring the fulfillment of the state plan, they explored new sources of production themselves and extensively accepted orders. As a result, they handed over to the state a profit of 3 billion yuan rather than losing business.

The question of the enterprises' "right to use people" which remained unsolved for many years has now begun "to liven up." In accordance with the "Resolution Concerning Rewards and Penalties for the Staff and Workers of Enterprises" promulgated by the State Council in May this year, the enterprises have the right to discharge or remove from the rolls the names of those who stay away from work without leave for 15 days at a stretch or stay away from work for 30 days in terms of accumulative total in a year and who refuse to mend their ways despite repeated admonitions. In addition, many localities have stipulated instructions for assessing and promoting the staff and workers of enterprises within a specific time, for recruiting new workers according to the principle of priority, and for employing contract workers on a trial basis. This has put an end to all kinds of drawbacks of the previous practice of everybody holding an "iron rice bowl" to a certain extent and has encouraged those who are diligent and lashed those who are idle.

Some people say that at present the localities and enterprises have such large amounts of officially listed funds. Is this not an act of undermining the state's finances? With regard to this question, we must make a concrete analysis. With regard to the country as a whole, most localities and enterprises have proper resources of officially listed funds. Take the Shoudu Iron and Steel Company for example. Before the implementation of the expansion of power, on the one hand, the state received profits from the Shoudu Iron and Steel Company, and on the other, it allocated funds for the capital construction of the company and made specially designed investment in the company. After balancing the accounts, the state received a real profit of 23.04 million yuan in 1978. Over the past 3 years after the expansion of power, the state received from the Shoudu Iron and Steel Company a real profit of 592.05 million yuan, averaging 197.35 million yuan or an increase of 750 percent over 1978. The real share of profits for the state constituted 83.6 percent of the total and the part retained by the enterprises accounted for 16.4 percent.

Sixty-three percent of the part retained by the enterprises of the Shoudu Iron and Steel Company was used in renovating technology, increasing varieties, raising quality, improving work conditions, economizing on energy and bringing pollution under control. These investments were all covered by state financial allocations in the past.

At present, the localities and enterprises not only have a total of 50 billion yuan of officially listed funds in their bands but also have 50 percent of the country's total of coal, 30 percent of the rolled steel, 40 percent of the timber and 70 percent of the cement. There is nothing wrong with this state of affairs. It creates the conditions for the localities and enterprises to carry out economic cooperation, opens up new sources of revenue for the construction of some weak departments of the country and the production of products that are in short supply. The slogan of "giving full play to the two initiatives of both the central authorities and the local (enterprise) authorities" which we have raised for many years has now really come true.

It is not long since our country carried out the policy of reinvigorating the domestic economy. We have insufficient experience in this respect and the various institutions still cannot be coordinated with one another. Therefore, errors and leaks are hard to avoid. Economic criminals are taking advantage of these loopholes.

We must strike resolute blows at the serious economic criminal activities rather than being softhearted. We must overcome the drawbacks, leaks and shortcomings in our work as quickly as possible, and particular attention should be paid to improving the economic results of enterprises. However, now that practice has proved that the policy of revitalizing the economy is correct we must persist with it. We must not waver in its orientation. It is hopeless to take a road of retrogression.

SHIJIE JINGJI DAOBAO CITED ON INFLATION

[Article by Luo Genmo: "Why China Had Three Periods of Inflation"]

[Text] After the People's Republic was founded, we successfully overcome the inflation left behind by the former regime and stabilized commodity prices. For a time, some believed inflation would not occur under the socialist system.

This is an over-simplification. Socialist currency symbolizes the value of labour, the same as in capitalist countries. Their difference does not lie in whether they will give rise to inflations or not, but in the causes, the nature and outcome of inflation.

Chinese paper notes (renminbi) have undergone inflation on three occasions, but the characteristics of inflation here were quite different from those in capitalist countries.

There was widescale inflation immediately after the founding of the People's Republic, but that was what old China left us. The second and the third periods of inflation took place after the establishment of the socialist system when China was not involved in any major war. Although the interval between the two inflationary periods was longer than those in Western countries, it was inflation all the same.

The First Five Year Plan exceeded production quotas. Thereafter, "leftist" influences led us into a campaign to communize rural villages. This ran counter to actual conditions, and undermined the productive forces in the countryside.

The "Great Leap Forward," which stressed steel production as the key factor in development, further reduced agricultural and light industrial production and caused an imbalance in purchasing power and the quantity of commodities available. The results were financial deficits and an excess of paper notes, which in turn brought another inflationary period.

But this second inflationary period was not caused by the socialist economy. Rather, it was due to our lack of experience in economic construction. We blundered greatly in economic planning, especially in our treatment of the relationship between production and consumption. Blunders like this can be rectified and overcome by the socialist system itself.

The 10 years of "Cultural Revolution" pushed the nation's economy to the brink of total collapse. The situation changed after the gang of four was smashed, but the aftermath has influenced our economy. Production in some enterprises remains out of kilter and a proper managerial system has not been set up.

The "leftist" error of 1977-78 again created an overstock in equipment and excessive investment. There were, moreover, several major expenditures that had to be defrayed for economic and political reasons. These included increased procurement prices in agricultural products and raises in the wages of workers and functionaries, and back wages for those whose wrongs were redressed. These were responsible for the present, or the third, period of inflation.

Preventable

An analysis of the second and third inflationary periods shows that inflation in China, which differs fundamentally from those in Western countries, is not native to the socialist economic system and it is therefore preventable. Our inflation was the result of "leftist" ideas and mistakes in planning. If we can draw lessons from past experiences, we can avoid inflation.

The superiority of our socialist system lies in the fact that whenever inflation occurs we can take remedial measures which are not possible in capitalist economies. These are:

-- We can stabilize market prices in a short period of time, one, two or three years, after the start of inflation.

-- Not all commodity prices rise during the period of inflation. We can make use of the advantages of the socialist system to guarantee that the prices of certain staples will not rise or increase only minimally.

-- After inflation, the prices of commodities affecting the national economy and people's livelihood will, as a rule, return to their previous level. This protects the interests of citizens who keep bank deposits or hold government bonds.

SPECIALIZED PRODUCTION EXPANDS IN COUNTRYSIDE

[XINHUA commentator's article: "Specialized and Selected Households -- A Good Form of Specialized and Socialized Production in the Countryside"]

[Excerpts] Beijing, 12 Aug (XINHUA) -- At present, millions of specialized and selected households have emerged in China's countryside. This is something new in China's rural economic life and a good form of specialized and socialized production in the rural areas.

The specialized and selected households are engaged in various professions. Some of them grow vegetables, cotton, flowers, fruit trees and medicinal herbs while others breed sheep, rabbits, mink, bees, silkworms and clams for cultivating pearls. Still others are processing farm and sideline products, doing transport and construction business, running restaurants, warehouses and hotels, and providing livery service. They all have emerged to meet the needs of the times and those of society and to keep pace with the developing economy. The emergence of these specialized and selected households is not accidental. With the implementation of production responsibility systems of various forms in the countryside in recent years, peasants' productivity and income have greatly increased. There is a surplus of manpower and funds in the vast countryside. Some peasant households with scientific and technical knowledge and competent in management have taken the road of becoming specialized and selected households.

The emergence of specialized and selected households has greatly expanded possibilities. As compared with peasant households prior to the movement to organize cooperatives, this type of household economy has broken natural economic boundaries and become an embryonic form of specialized commodity production. As compared with commune members' family sideline production some 20 years ago, there has been development from sideline production with an auxiliary labor force working in its spare time to main production with the main labor force working full time. The emergence of this household economy has provided all types of talented people in the countryside with the chance to display their skills to the full in carrying out specialized commodity production. On the other hand, it has also promoted vigorous development of various activities in the field of science and technology in the rural areas and brought up more professionally competent people. It has become a major force in invigorating the rural economy and opened up a new road for the peasants to become well-to-do.

The inevitable result of the emergence of many specialized selected households is that some peasants will gradually leave farming and consequently decline to sign contracts for the use of farmland. At a time when there is a surplus of farming manpower, it is good for some peasants to separate themselves from the farm. This is not bad at all. In the past, under the influence of "leftist" thinking, it was arbitrarily required that "all manpower should be used for farming." This is wrong. It must be realized that ours is a nation with a vast population and only limited arable land. Some localities have concentrated their farming manpower on limited arable land. This is the main reason that causes low productivity and a declining rural economy. If this goes on, there will be no way out for agriculture. Realizing this, we should dispel our worries and create even more specialized and selected households boldly, enthusiastically and in a planned manner.

RENMIN RIBAO ON IMPORTING TECHNOLOGY, MACHINERY

[Article by Zhu Yuening [2612 1878 1337]: "Give Weight to the Importation of Technology and Machinery"]

[Text] In recent years, following the implementation of our open-door policy, our export trade has developed rather substantially. The foreign exchange earnings of the state have increased year by year. How should we make use of these foreign exchange earnings? What kinds of goods should be imported in order to make an even better contribution to socialist modernization?

Our country is a developing socialist nation and is relatively backward both economically and technologically. We should raise economic effect and proceed with the technical restructuring and renewal of the equipment of our existing enterprises. This will require a large investment, including a sizable amount of foreign exchange, to introduce from abroad advanced and appropriate technology and import urgently needed machinery and equipment. Hence, at the present stage, in the composition of our structure of imports, the amount of foreign exchange to be expended on technology and machinery should occupy a relatively important proportion.

However, in the composition of the commodities imported into our country at present, the amount of foreign exchange expended on raw materials for production and means of livelihood such as clothing and food occupies by far the greatest proportion while the proportion of foreign exchange spent on the importation of technology, machinery and equipment is very small. For example, in 1980 and 1981 the amounts of foreign exchange spent on the importation of raw materials were respectively 51.4 percent and 64.4 percent of the whole, those on the means of livelihood were respectively 21.2 percent and 27.4 percent, whereas the amounts spent on importation of technology and machinery were respectively 27.5 percent and 26.2 percent. (The statistics for the import of technology and machinery included various kinds of vehicles, ships, aeroplanes and machines and tools such as tractors, cranes and bulldozers. If these statistics were eliminated, then the amount of foreign exchange actually expended on importing technology and machinery amounted to only a little over 10 percent of the whole.)

This relative weight is much smaller than that during the period of the First 3-Year Plan. During the latter period, over 30 percent (in some years over 40 percent) of the total amount of foreign exchange spent on imports was devoted to the importation of technology and machinery. Moreover, this ratio is much smaller than that found in many developed countries and developing countries and areas. Generally speaking, in other countries of the world, the amount of foreign exchange used on the importation of technology and machinery is usually about one-third of the total amount spent on imports. Obviously, in the present composition of our imports, the relative weight placed on technology and machinery tends to be on the low side.

The size of the relative weight placed on the import of technology and machinery has an immense effect on the balance of trade. The diminution in the importation of commodities of a so-called "capital" nature can very possibly bring about a relatively large favorable balance of trade. It is a pity when one has money but nowhere to spend it and has to keep it in hand. Too much foreign exchange retained and unused may cause an increased issuance of banknotes in the country concerned and may affect its fiscal receipts and expenditures. Therefore, expanding the importation of technology and machinery is also highly beneficial to the stabilization of the fiscal receipts and expenditures of a country.

Expanding the importation of technology and machinery raises the question of how to treat the importation of consumer goods. The importation of a definite ratio of consumer goods is necessary at all times. Particularly in the readjustment of our economy during recent years, expanding in a suitable manner the importation of consumer goods has played an important role in enlivening the domestic market, enriching people's lives, increasing the return-flow of currency, and improving the state of the fiscal receipts and expenditures. Speaking from the angle of economic development, the importation of grain is beneficial in that the farmers may take a hard-earned rest and that the internal structure of agriculture may be readjusted, while the importation of certain industrial consumer goods has the function of motivating and stimulating producers of similar goods in the country to raise their technological level, or to trial produce or turn out new products. Some people who fail to see the function of the importation of some consumer goods as mentioned above may hold that no consumer goods should be imported and that we must produce everything ourselves. This is obviously not correct. Nevertheless, the proportion consumer goods occupies in the importation structure must still be continuously readjusted according to feasibility and the requirements of internal economic development.

In expanding the importation of technology and machinery, we come across the problem of how to understand and implement the policy of "import replacement or alternative." In the composition of our import trade, the relative weight between industrial and agricultural products is about 50-50. Of these, a portion are materials (including certain finished products) in the nature of "resources" of "raw materials" such as various kinds of mineral ores, nonferrous metals, timber, cotton (mostly used in processing for reexport), and so on. It is correct to fix every year the quantities of their import in accordance with the conditions of production and demand in the country. But a rather large portion of these belongs to the category of industrial finished products, such as agricultural chemicals, cement, steel products, chemical raw materials, synthetic rubber, chemical fiber, chemical fertilizer, and so on. This portion of materials occupies a rather large proportion of the total imports. Now the question arises: Shall we year after year gradually increase their importation? Or, shall we carry out the policy of "import alternatives," that is to say, the introduction and importation of foreign technology and machinery to increase the domestic production capacity, gradually to reduce imports, or not to import at all, and eventually to turn to exporting similar products ourselves? In our opinion, we should, in a clear-headed and appropriate manner, carry out the policy of "import alternatives" and import technology and machinery to produce those materials which must be imported over a prolonged period. (In the case of chemical fertilizers, we have already imported many sets of equipment; the principal question now is how to put the production capacity into full play).

We cannot remain contented with merely buying "eggs" from the world market. Rather, we should buy the "hens" (machinery) so that they will produce the eggs for our consumption. Similarly, we should not be contented with always buying "fish" from the international market. Rather, we must learn the technique of "catching fish." Naturally, the so-called "import alternatives" policy has its merits and demerits. If we make it into an "absolutism," or have it crystallized under the illusion that we must do everything ourselves and should not depend on others, then possibly the technological and economic development of our country may be impeded. It is even possible that overanxiety to have the "alternative" or replacement may work out to be a heavy burden on imports, to the extent that the "import alternative" is tantamount to a "closed-door" policy. This should be carefully noted and we should be on guard against it.

Concerning the expansion of the importation of technology and machinery, there is also the question of how to treat the importation of complete sets of equipment. For a prolonged period of time, our introduction of technology and importation of equipment have in the main relied on the import of complete sets of equipment. In particular, in 1978, under the influence of "leftist" ideology, we blindly, and rather extensively, imported many whole-set equipment projects. This far surpassed the capability of the country and aggravated the imbalance in the proportionate relationships of the national economy. Hence, it is necessary now to earnestly sum up the bitter experiences and lessons of the past and gradually change the mode of mainly relying on the importation of complete sets of equipment and to enhance our standard of introduction of foreign technology. As a matter of fact, since 1979, our importation of complete sets of equipment has been basically put under control. The number of such projects has dwindled and little foreign exchange has thus been expended. An important factor explaining why at present in our import composition the relative weight of technology and machinery is rather small is that the import of complete sets of equipment has been reduced while the importation of "single items" of technology has not progressed fast enough. Importing complete sets of equipment is one way of introducing advanced technology and of importing machinery, but it is not the only way or the best way. Following the continuous increase in the economic and technological level of our country, we should gradually shift the pivotal point to the introduction of the technological "software" items. However, this requires a relatively stronger digestive power in the country. Judging from the present state of our country's scientific and technological level, as well as our power to absorb or to digest, we cannot yet introduce too many "single-items" of technology. It is certain that we must import complete sets of equipment. Even in the technologically developed countries, simultaneously with their introduction of major technology, they still have to import a definite quantity of complete sets of equipment. Naturally, in importing complete sets of equipment, we have to be very careful. We must study first, and well, the feasibility of the project and ensure that it can be completed on schedule. More importantly, we must raise the ratio of the "subcontracting" of the complete sets of equipment. In other words, in each project for a complete set of equipment, our machine-building industry should take up as large as possible a portion of the designing and building tasks. In the importation of the complete sets of equipment in the 1950's, the ratio of subcontracting granted to departments of our country was in the neighborhood of 40 percent and was even higher in certain projects. At present, the technological level of our machine-building industry is much higher than that during the 1950's and therefore the ratio of subcontracting to our country can be correspondingly much higher. For example, on the average, the subcontracting given to departments of our country should be 50 to 60 percent of each complete set of equipment. In this way, in reality, the importation of complete sets of equipment is tantamount to importing only the key or major equipment and parts. One of the lessons learned in 1978 was that basically we gave up the subcontracting of the equipment on our part.

There is also the question of how to correctly protect our national industries in expanding the importation of technology and machinery. The important factor in economic construction is that our national industries must be protected. It constitutes a long-term irrevocable policy on our part. In particular, in the case of those industrial departments which have not developed well, they required protection in the past and are still in need of protection now and in the future. We cannot and should not allow our industries to remain in an unprotected state and thus have to compete with the highly developed industries of other countries. Over the last few years, there were certain phenomena of the pounding or lashing of the domestic market and the development of the national industries. For example, there were such instances of there being excessive importation of durable consumer goods and this even getting our of control; machinery which would be manufactured in the country with fairly high quality was still being imported; and that certain vehicles and tools banned from being imported were smuggled into the country. No doubt all these happenings were wrong and should be duly rectified. However, the primary purpose of protection is to promote development and to continuously raise the technical level of our industries and their competitive power. The introduction of technology and importation of machinery constitutes one of the effective measures to achieve this objective. It is hard to imagine that in order to "protect" an industrial department which is relatively weak in development we actually refuse to arm it with advanced technology and machinery to enhance its technical level. It is not necessarily beneficial to give an industrial department unconditional, or absolute, protection. Concerning our domestic industries, we should adopt a national policy of protection, that is to say, there must be some difference in the scope of protection, the period of protection and the degree of protection for different periods and different industrial departments. Generally speaking, unconditional protection should not be used for too long a period. We should selectively, in a well-prepared manner and armed with a definite objectives, allow our domestic industries to "fight" their way out and to take part in international competition. Conversely, we can make certain appropriate introductions and importations to stir up the fire of competition, in this way accelerating the advancement and maturity of our industries.

WAN LI, HU QIAOMU MEET WORK-STUDY DELEGATES

[Excerpts] Beijing, 9 Aug (XINHUA) -- Comrades Wan Li and Hu Qiaomu met with all the delegates attending the national work conference on the work-study system in middle and primary schools, and had a discussion with them today at the small auditorium of the Great Hall of the People.

In his speech Comrade Wan Li pointed out: Education must be closely combined with productive labor. This principle must be adhered to, as it is necessary for achieving the four modernizations. It is hoped that party and government leadership at all levels and localities will strengthen leadership and support for the work-study system so that schools will turn out competent people better meeting the requirements of the four modernizations.

Comrade Hu Qiaomu said: The work-study system is an important principle for education as a whole. Our education is to train workers for the socialist cause, and not to train idlers who reap without sowing. For students in rural areas, their task is to build a new socialist countryside. Not only students in rural areas should have such high aspirations, but many students in cities, too, should make up their minds to go to the rural areas and help the peasants build a new socialist countryside, because China is mainly a rural country. The work-study system is the best way to foster a correct attitude toward labor among students.

Comrade Hu Qiaomu said: Labor education is an important educational program. The conference on work-study held by the Ministry of Education shows that the work-study system in middle and primary schools throughout the country has produced good results. In future, the institutions of higher learning should also develop and popularize step by step the work-study system in the light of the needs and possibilities of different specialities. The principle of combining education and productive labor is correct, even though there has been the erroneous tendency to go too far in the past, particularly during the "10 years of internal disorder" when the "gang of four" sabotaged education, put forward some very absurd slogans and adopted some ridiculous measures in the educational field, causing some people to have doubts about combining education and productive labor. We must resolutely correct the mistakes, but this does not mean to give up the correct principle of combining education with productive labor. Ours is a country of working people, and our education is to train workers serving the working people on all fronts. Their work is in general a combination of mental labor and physical labor. Physical workers must also do mental work, and mental workers must also do physical work. It is impossible to completely separate mental work from physical work.

Luo Libin, vice chairman of Guangxi Zhuang Autonomous Region; Hu Xiongfei, deputy director of the Heilongjiang provincial education department; Yu Zhiguang, deputy director of the Sichuan provincial cultural office; and others reported at the meeting on achievements made in their areas in developing the work-study system and work that remains to be done.

RENMIN RIBAO RECALLS RESISTANCE UNIVERSITY

[Article by Wu Fanwu [0702 0416 0710]: "Unite, Be Firm, Serious and Dynamic -- Reminiscences of the Administrative Work Style of the Political Department of the Resistance University"]

[Text] During the period of the anti-Japanese war, the Chinese People's Anti-Japanese Military and Political University (called Resistance University for short) trained a vast number of cadres with ability and political integrity for the Eighth Route Army, the New Fourth Army and local party and government organs at various levels, and thus was extensively commended by the people throughout the country and our foreign friends. As the working body of the party organizations in the Resistance University, the political department of the Resistance University played an important role and achieved prominent success in implementing the educational guiding principles laid down by the party's central authorities and Comrade Mao Zedong, in carrying forward and developing the party's fine traditions, cultivating a good school spirit, and so on. I studied and work in the Resistance University for many years, and also worked in the political department of the main campus for a while. The fine work style characterized by "being united, alert, earnest and lively" which prevailed in the organs of the political department at that time profoundly impressed me.

The administrative organs of the political department of the Resistance University consisted of many veteran Red Army fighters and many old cadres who had long been engaged in the underground revolutionary struggle in the white areas, as well as quite a few young comrades who, like us, had just joined the revolution. At that time, we new cadres highly respected our old colleagues, and the old cadres also showed deep concern for the young cadres. Therefore, the old and new cadres got along very well and united as one. Comrade Zhang Jichun, director of the political department, a veteran Red Army cadre, was a modest, unassuming and very affable man. He often talked personally with cadres in the department and was deeply concerned with the political studies and work of the colleagues. Therefore, all of us were glad to associate with him, frankly told him what we were thinking and affectionately referred to him as our "old mammy." Young people always liked to gather in his cave dwelling.

And he, like a kind old man, used to tell us some revolutionary stories and patiently gave us lessons on revolution which were highly educational for us. He always set examples for others and took the lead in working, building cave dwellings, reclaiming wasteland, or cultivating. He never asked for privileges in living conditions. One time, when eating with us, he found there was more oil in his vegetable soup. Then he immediately went to the kitchen to find out what had actually happened. In fact, it was out cook who was disposed to spoon out for Comrade Zhang more drops of oil from the soup pot since he knew that Comrade Zhang had to work hard despite his bad health. Having found out the true story, Comrade Zhang Jichun humorously told the cook: "Now, everyone can have only a little bit of oil. Therefore, from now on, nobody is allowed to get advantages at the expense of others!" The relationship between the cadres in the organ was also good and all of us were concerned with each otehr. Whenever someone was sick, all the others came to inquire after his health, collecting medicines and preparing food for him. Whenever someone was not in a good mood, all the others would voluntarily go to help him to solve his ideological problems. This was a kind of real friendship between comrades in a big revolutionary family.

At that time, although there was difference in terms of status, posts and working relationship between superior and subordinate organs and between senior and junior cadres, everybody got along quite well. When talking about work and ideological problems, everyone had a sincere and frank attitude, and nobody felt ill at ease or was on his guard against others. When cadres at the grassroots level or students of the university called at the political department, the cadres of the department always enthusiastically received them, handing them a bowl of boiled water, seating them on a chair or on the bed, and making them feel at home. In fact, they never felt any difficulty in "going into the office and requesting an interview," and they never needed to be afraid of being "treated coldly." As I remember, in the winter of 1938 near the end of the fourth period of the Resistance University, in consideration of the situation in which the university was going to be divided into several parts and moved to the enemy's rear area, and that female comrades had difficulties in getting through the enemy's blockades, the party's Central Committee decided to transfer some female students to the women's university and some others to public health and telecommunications schools.

However, the women comrades at that time were very enthusiastic about participating in the war of resistance against Japanese aggression and many of them went to the political department and asked to be sent to the enemy's rear area or to the front. Some of them even went directly to see Comrade Zhang Jichun several times. Comrade Zhang Jichun and cadres in the administrative organ talked to them patiently to bring them around and also met the demands of some of those who were relatively strong and were very determined to go. An extra team was formed which went together with the university headquarters to the enemy's rear. After this, the women comrades in this team persisted in struggling in the enemy's rear till victory was achieved in the war of resistance against aggression.

The unity of organs under the political department was not one of "keeping on good terms with everyone at the expense of principle." When faced with questions of principle and unhealthy trends, everyone would take the party stand, proceed with the desire of achieving unity and helping others, and carry out criticism and self-criticism in order to reach a common understanding and attain the goal of achieving unity. Comrade Xie Hanwen, director of the propaganda section, had been a divisional political commissar in the Red Army. He studied diligently and had many books. His Marxist theoretical level was relatively high. Many cadres liked to borrow books from him and sought advice from him. He always enthusiastically helped others. However, he was never vague on matters of principle. Once, at a party meeting, the director of the education section put forth the idea that "the petit bourgeois ideology also had its merits." Comrade Xie Hanwen held that "the petit bourgeois ideology" meant undesirable ideas which are determined by the economic position of the petit bourgeoisie, ideas such as selfishness, narrowness, vanity and aversion to discipline.

Only through ideological remolding could those with petit bourgeois ideas foster the proletarian ideology and truly become evolutionary fighters of the proletariat. If we thought that"the petit bourgeois ideology also had its merits," we might slacken our ideological remolding and this would be harmful to the work of educating and remolding the petit bourgeois intellectuals. At the meeting, he presented facts and reasoned things out. He had a heated discussion with the director of the education section. Finally, Luo Ruiqing, vice president of the university, gave a summary of the discussion and they reached a common understanding. After the meeting, they remained on very intimate terms. They studied theoretical questions and mapped out plans together. Their unity was not affected in the least. On another occasion, cadres of the political department of the Resistance University went to gather firewood on the mountains. On their way back, they took a rest under some of the villagers' persimmon trees. They were thirsty and hungry. Among them was a woman who was the wife of a leading cadre of the university. She saw a persimmon on the ground dirtied with mud. She picked it up, wiped off the dirt and ate it. This was reported to Comrade Zhang Jichun who solemnly said: "Not taking a single needle or piece of thread from the masses" is the discipline of our army and cadres of the Resistance University must take the laed in observing this discipline. Eating a persimmon itself is a minor matter but since it involves the discipline in relations with the masses, it is no longer a minor matter. Party branches of the organs held meetings to discuss the question of "whether or not the persimmon should have been eaten." At these meetings, the matter was analyzed and criticized. In this way, the person who ate the persimmon and all cadres of the organs received a vivid and concrete education on consciously observing discipline. This healthy democratic practice of the political department of the Resistance University helped everyone foster the style of unity, friendship, solemnity and seriousness. Correct ideas were encouraged and undesirable ideas and styles were corrected in good time. Everyone had peace of mind. I remember that on New Year's Eve 1938, all organ personnel were present at a tea party to see the old year out and to usher in the new year. At the party, nearly every comrade consciously talked about the good points and weak ones in his ideology, work, study and daily life in that year, and made suggestions for work in the new year. Luo Ruiqing, vice president of the university, was also present at this tea party of the political department. He spoke favorably of the tea party: "This lively way of doing political work of yours is worthy of being learned by all."

At that time, organs of the political department were small but efficient and overstaffing never occurred. The duties of director, section directors and secretaries were all clearly defined and they all quietly immersed themselves in hard work. They always worked vigorously and speedily. Vice President Luo and Director Zhang personally gave reports to the students and wrote articles for the magazine of the Resistance University and for the JUNZHEND AZAHI of the Eighth Route Army. When he was deputy director of the political department, Comrade Hu Yaobang attached great importance to the university magazine SIXIANG ZHANXIAN and wrote an article entitled "On Liberalism and Opposing Liberalism" for the first issue of the magazine. Besides, he personally did the work of recruiting party members. He gave lectures on the party to the students and talked with prospective party members. He also presided over oath-taking ceremonies of those being admitted to the party. At that time, the CPC Central Committee demanded that the Resistance University recruit a large number of intellectuals into the party according to the principle of "actively and carefully recruiting party members." In each academic session, 70-80 percent of the students were to be recruited into the party. This was a very important political task. At that time, the political history and social connections of some educated youths were relatively more complicated, but they were very anxious to be admitted into the party. They hoped that the party organizations could clear up their questions.

Therefore, they often wrote thousands and even tens of thousands of words in their applications to talk about their history and social connections. These applications were often thick copies. In spite of this, Comrade Li Zhimin, director of the organization section, always read them patiently and carefully. Then he would talk separately with them and put questions to them in order to have a clearer understanding about them and to draw prompt conclusions. Those who were accorded with the requirements were admitted into the party. Since the work was heavy, he often worked till midnight and his eyes became bloodshot. This serious and responsible spirit of the old cadres set us an example. At that time, I also worked in the organization section and often voluntarily worked overtime. Sometimes we had to walk dozens of li to gather material from the students. In June, 1938, in order to greet the first anniversary of the war of resistance against Japanese aggression, the university carried out a vigours movement to "strive to become a shock worker." Under slogans of revolutionary emulation -- "do a crash job of study and work and lead a meaningful life" and "strive to become a shock worker" -- the study, work and daily life in organs of the political department became even more bustling. Within a month, 520 "shock workers" emerged in the university. Many comrades in the political department were also selected as glorious "shock workers."

We led an arduous life in the Resistance Univeristy but everyone was full of vigor and vitality, happy and lively. At that time, I was young and active and was elected as director of the recreation club. I therefore took the lead in doing physical exercises and asked Comrade Zheng Lucheng, a secretary of the propaganda section, to teach singing. I liked playing table tennis even when I was a child and section directors Li Zhimin and Li Yimin also liked to play table tennis. Very often we were rivals in table tennis matches. We were like members of the same family, playing ball, having heart-to-heart talks and making jokes together. On festivals, ball games and evening parties would make the organs even more lively.

At present, leading organs of the party, the government and the army throughout the country are implementing the strategic decision of the CPC Central Committee on streamlining and restructuring organizations. Under these circumstances, if we recall the fine tradition of the Resistance University of "being united, alert, earnest and lively" and continue to carry it forward, we will still benefit from it in our work to improve bureaucracy and to promote a closer relationship between the leadership and the rank and file and among comrades.

COMMENTATOR ON NITROGENOUS FERTILIZER INDUSTRY

[Commentator's article: "Gratifying Changes in the Small Nitrogenous Fertilizer Industry"]

[Text] The small nitrogenous fertilizer industry which has suffered losses for a long time is now making up deficits and increasing surpluses. This is an important and gratifying change on the chemical industrial front.

The small nitrogenous fertilizer industry is an important force in China's chemical fertilizer industry. It produces 53 percent of the nation's total output of nitrogenous fertilizer. For many years, the industry was losing money and many plants had to rely on state subsidies to continue operation. This not only increased the state's financial burden, but also affected the development of the small nitrogenous fertilizer industry. In the past 2 years the Ministry of Chemical Industry has coordinated with all provinces, municipalities and autonomous prefectures to readjust and restructure the enterprises, and shut down or stopped some enterprises that were consuming too much energy and suffering great losses, while strengthening the administrative work of the enterprises and doing a good job of technological remolding centered on economizing on the consumption of energy. As a result, there has been a significant improvement in the administrative and technological levels ofthe enterprises and better economic returns have been scored.

Facts have proved that the feature of some backward trades which have been losing money for a long period of time can be changed if they seriously implement the "eight-character" policy.

The fact that the small nitrogenous fertilizer industry has been able to make up deficits and increase surpluses indicates that words alone cannot improve economic returns; we must make arduous efforts to achieve it. In general, the conditions of the backward enterprises are relatively unfavorable and problems still exist. However, if we squarely face these problems and bring the subjective initiative into full play, find ways to overcome difficulties and are willing to devote ourselves to make up deficits, we will be able to overcome difficulties and the unfavorable conditions can be changed. In recent years, the chemical fertilizer industry has seriously tackled the rectification of the leadership groups of small nitrogenous fertilizer enterprises. Most of these enterprises are located in small and medium-sized cities and most leaders are not familiar with chemical fertilizer production technology, and they do not have any administrative experience. In light of this situation, many provinces and prefectures are promoting to leadership posts engineers and technicians who have good party work style, who are devoted and are technically and administratively competent. This plays a major role in improving the administration work of small nitrogenous fertilizer enterprises and in raising economic returns. At the same time, they are tackling the problem of high consumption and extravagance by small nitrogenous fertilizer enterprises, publicizing effective measures to economize on energy consumption, popularize the administrative experiences of advanced enterprises, such as the Tongxiang chemical fertilizer plant in Zhejiang, strengthening administration over skills, equipment and raw materials, and doing a good job in accounting so that the consumption of coal and electricity by small nitrogenous fertilizer enterprises will drop by a large margin. Comparing 1981 to 1976, the consumption of coal and electricity used in producing every ton of ammonia has dropped by 43 and 34 percent respectively. The deficit of the whole trade has dropped from 97 million yuan to 39 million yuan, a decrease of 95 percent. In the first quarter of this year, after several years' hard work, the situation in which the small nitrogenous fertilizer industry has suffered losses for a long time has been changed.

Although the small nitrogenous fertilizer industry is making profits now, its development is unbalanced. One-half of the enterprises are still losing money and the task to make up deficits and increase surpluses is still heavy. Therefore, we must not slacken our effort. We believe that if we seriously implement the policy of "readjusting, restructuring, reorganizing and upgrading," carry out correct technological and economic policies, and adopt effective rational measures, the small nitrogenous fertilizer industry will become increasingly prosperous.

ANHUI REVIEWS 1977-81 AGRICULTURAL SUCCESSES

[Text] Hefei, August 11 (XINHUA) -- Anhui Province, once one of the most poverty-stricken in China, harvested 17.85 million tons of grain in 1981, compared to 15 million tons in 1977, according to a release from provincial authorities.

Anhui peasants sold to the state an annual average of 4.05 million tons of surplus grain from 1979 to 1981, 53.06 percent more than the corresponding figure for the period from 1963 to 1978. It is expected that more surplus grain will be available this year.

The authorities issued the release to report agricultural successes since the third plenary session of the 11th Chinese Communist Party Central Committee held in December 1978.

Provincial authorities attributed the increases to the policies of encouraging rural prosperity, including the institution of the job responsibility system under which production is undertaken on a household basis and payment made according to output.

Together with Sichuan and a number of other provinces, Anhui pioneered some of these policies, which became official following the convocation of the Third Plenanry Session of the 11th Central Committee of the Chinese Communist Party.

Many poverty-stricken areas have changed "beyond recognition" under the new policies according to provincial authorities. An example is Fengyang County, once notorious throughout China as the "county of beggars," which for more than 20 years had to depend on the government for grain for its people. In the 1981 fiscal year for grain purchases (July 1, 1981 to May 31, 1982), the county supplied the state with 117,500 tons of surplus grain.

During the same one-year period, authorities said, 40 countries -- half the total in Anhui Province -- each delivered as tax in kind or sold to the state, 50,000 tons of surplus grain or more.

The figure for Huiyan County is 195,000 tons, more than any other country in Anhui. This compares to 65,000 tons in the 1977 fiscal year.

ANHUI CONFERENCE ON RAISING HARVEST YIELD

[Excerpts] The Anhui Provincial CPC Committee and the provincial government held a telephone conference on 7 August. The conference called on all localities in Anhui Province to unfold activities on raising agricultural production in autumn and striving to seize a bumper agricultural harvest in this year.

Secretaries of the provincial CPC committee Yan Youmin and (Yuan Zhen) and provincial Vice Governor Meng Fulin took part in the conference. The conference first analyzed the situation in struggling against disasters. Since the advent of summer, Anhui Province has been hit by drought, windstorms, hailstorms, flooding and waterlogging. Some 15 million mu of farmland have been affected and over 4 million mu of farmland have experienced bad harvests due to natural disaster. Under the correct leadership of the CPC Central Committee, the provincial CPC committee and the provincial government, the party, the government, the military and the people have successfully combated floods in the province. The conference expressed the hope that all people in the province would continue to try to combat disasters in August and September and seize a bumper harvest.

The conference held that it is possible that the province could still increase agricultural production in 1982, despite serious natural disasters. The conference stressed that since the present situation is very good, the party and government in various localities must, therefore, continue to mobilize the masses and fully utilize the favorable conditions to fight a people's war of increasing production the coming autumn and greet the 12th party congress with our excellent achievements.

ANHUI CONTROLS FUEL FOR FARM MACHINERY

[Text] Anhui Province is improving management of farm machinery fuel supply and consumption and ensuring that fuel of limited quantity be used where it is most needed for production. It has adopted the following specific measures:

1. To improve the distribution of fuel for farm machinery: The distribution plan is formulated jointly by the petroleum, the supply and marketing and the farm machinery departments at various levels. In fuel distribution, the concerned departments of districts and communes set fuel supply quotas for each machine owned by a collective or an individual according to its horsepower and task and issue a quota certificate to its owner.

2. To strictly enforce regulations and stop up all loopholes: Illicit oil transaction by any units or individuals is strictly prohibited. Resolute blows will be dealt at speculators who illegally buy and sell fuel oil. No quota certificate is issued to a farm machine which is used for commercial transport, has no operating permit, has already been sold, has been scrapped, is awaiting repair or is mothballed.

3. To save fuel and reduce wastes: Addition of machinery which consumes large quantities of oil is under control according to plan. Blind purchase of any machinery which creates fuel supply problems is being avoided.

FUJIAN STEPS UP INFRASTRUCTURE CONSTRUCTION

[Text] Fuzhou , August 12 (XINHUA) -- Costal Fujian Province is speeding construction of its industrial infrastructure -- ports, railways, airports and telecommunications facilities -- in an effort to cope with its expanding external economic activities, according to provincial authorities. The provincial government has allocated 304 million yuan in the past three years for building these projects, and the investment for this year nearly doubled last year's figure. Priority is being given to construction of ports and the developing shipping industry. Of the six ports now under construction, Dongdu port at Xiamen and Mawei port at the provincial capital of Fuzhou are Fujian's major foreign trade ports. The first stage of the Dongdu port includes four deep-water berths for handling vessels of 10,000 tons and more. Principal construction of the No. 1 and No. 2 berths was completed at the end of 1981 along with roads, electricity, water facilities, warehouses and railways. The No. 1 berth, for 10,000-ton ships, will handle sundry goods and containers. The No. 2 berth, for 50,000-ton ships, will temporarily handle grain. Two other berths are currently nearing completion.

Mawei port will have two 10,000-ton-class berths and two 5,000-ton-class berths. The navigation channel and harbor basin have been dredged.

Fujian has 62 foreign trade freighters totalling 84,000 tons, 54,000 tons more than two years ago. In addition to the major domestic ports of Shanghai, Qingdao and Dalian, the province has opened freight routes from Fuzhou to Hong Kong, Singapore, Penang, Manila and Bangkok. The province resumes passenger and freight services from Fuzhou to Shanghai in March, and opened a passenger shipping route from Xiamen to Hong Kong in 1980.

The Yingtan-Xiamen and Waiyang-Fuzhou railways are being technically transformed. By 1985, eight big stations and 22 medium-sized and small stations and store yards will be built or expanded along the two lines. When electrified in 1987, the two railways will carry 12 million tons of goods annually, double the present figure. One piling yard and three big stations are already in use.

Since the opening of the expanded Fuzhou airport April 1, passengers and cargo has quadrupled. The airport accomodates Tridents and Boeing 737s while previously only small 40-passenger planes could land and take off during the day. The main runway has been lengthened to 2,400 meters and a control tower built. A new airport at Xiamen near the city's special economic zone is also being built. Upon completion, this medium-sized international airport will also accomodate Tridents and Boeing 737s.

With the opening of the Fuzhou-Hong Kong telephone circuit earlier this year, calls from Hong Kong can be transmitted through Fuzhou to other provincial cities and counties. International telex service has opened in Fuzhou and Xiamen. Both Fuzhou and Xiamen have imported computer-controlled automatic telephones to improve service between the two cities and other parts of China and abroad. When service of the domestic long-distance line begins at the end of this year, automatic and semi-automatic dialing will be possible between Fuzhou and 20 of China's provincial capitals. Fujian now has telephone lines with 40 countries and regions and telegram contacts with 100 countries and regions.

SHANGHAI PAPER HAILS FORTHCOMING PARTY CONGRESS

[Text] The 7th Plenary Session of the 11th CPC Central Committee decided that the 12th CPC National Congress will be held on 1 September this year. The happy tidings have been a tremendous inspiration to party members and cadres as well as to the masses of the people throughout Shanghai. They are all earnestly looking forward to the victorious convocation of the congress.

Our party has traversed a glorious and arduous course since the 11th CPC National Congress. The historically significant 3d Plenary Session of the 11th CPC Central Committee brought the party to a great turning point in its history since the founding of the country. Between the 3d and 6th Plenary Sessions of the 11th CPC Central Committee, the party had accomplished its historical task of righting the wrong in the guiding thought, reiterated and defined the Marxist ideological, political and organizational lines, formulated and implemented a series of correct principles and policies after summing up both the positive and negative experiences since the founding of our country and found the path to socialist modernization that is compatible with the situation in China. All socialist undertakings in China have been developing along a sound course. It has been just a few years and the change in the situation has been so fast and, in the motherland's views, so great. This is eloquent proof that the line, principles and policies of the party since the 3d Plenary Session of the 11th CPC Central Committee have been correct and that it is also correct for the party Central Committee to uphold the four basic principles and set forth the four political guarantees for socialist modernization. This also fully demonstrates that our party, with its strong leadership, definitely will be able to unite and lead the people of the whole country to create a completely new situation in our work.

The forthcoming 12th CPC National Congress will be a meeting of great significance held at a time of historic importance. The congress will, under the guidance of Marxism-Leninism and Mao Zedong Thought, sum up experiences, formulate and define the program and purpose of our party's struggle in a period to come, adopt a new party constitution and elect the leading organ of the party Central Committee. It will rally the whole party, the entire army and the people of the whole country still more closely round the party Central Committee, strengthen party building, give a further push to the cause of socialist modernization and add a glorious new chapter to the new historical period.

It is the common determination of the cadres and masses on all fronts in the municipality to greet the 12th CPC National Congress with actual deeds. Let us get moving quickly and use outstanding achievements in building socialist material and spiritual civilization while working on our respective fronts and at our own posts. We must pluck up our spirit and, in connection with the work being done in various fields, further study the guidelines of the documents issued by the party since the 3d Plenary Session of the 11th CPC Central Committee. We must carry out ideological education among the cadres, masses and particularly young people in the need to display their love for the party, the motherland and socialism. We must seize every single minute to strive to fulfill and overfulfill this year's state plans and gain still greater economic results. We must more extensively and deeply carry out the "five stresses and four beauties" activities, strengthen education in communist ideology and ethics and bring up a new generation of people with ideals, ethics, culture and a sense of discipline. We must persist in opposing erosion by capitalist ideas and carry out the struggle against serious crimes in the economic field through to the end and win new victories.

Our country has really entered a period of resurgence. We are full of hope and confidence when we look to the future. Let us make efforts to do our work at our respective posts in a down-to-earth way to create still more outstanding achievements.

YANGCHENG WANBAO ON FORMER OFFICIAL'S CORRUPTION

[Article by Wu Huomei [0702 3172 2653], YANGCHENG WANBAO reporter: "Maggot of the Special Zone -- Peng Guoxian"]

[Text] In the special zone of Shenzhen, people with high morale and enthusiasm are actively plunging themselves into the new situation of initiating socialist construction. But there are a handful of people who ignore the interests of the state and make use of their powers to engage in graft, embezzlement and bribery and who try by every means of smuggling and speculation to line their pockets. These people are called "maggots of the special zone." Peng Guoxian, former deputy director of the political office of the Shenzhen municipal border defense, is one such maggot.

This Peng Guoxian was transferred to Shenzhen in September 1978. In less than 3 years, he suddenly became rich. He built a private four-story house. The total area of Peng's residence was 308 square meters, including 11 rooms, 4 drawing rooms, 3 dining rooms and 2 kitchens with toilets. The whole building was finished with cement externally and was painted with latex paint internally. Of the four drawing rooms, the one on the first floor was floored with terrazzo, while the other three had "mosaic" floors. There was also a grape arbor on the roof. Compared with the housing of the people nearby, Peng's residence was like a crane standing among chickens.

The sudden richness of Peng Guoxian is inseparable from the embezzling, swindling and speculating of Li Yangfu. In the fall of 1979, the Shenzhen Special Zone was still in the experimental period; everything was ready except for prosperity. The construction teams from inside and outside the province entered Shenzhen one after another to start work.

In the winter of that year, Li Yangfu came from Wuchuan County to Shenzhen. This Li Yangfu had a record of constant stealing, swindling and speculating. With the assumed name of Chen Sheng and in the guise of a representative of a certain construction company of Wuchuan County, he prepared to contract for construction projects and to await the opportunity to engage in his evil deals. He was introduced to Peng Guoxian. By that time, although Peng had a house with three bedrooms and one dining room, he was still not satisfied. He racked his brains over how to build his cozy nest. When Li and Peng were introduced, each harbored sinister designs. One was trying to make a "good business" but suffered from a bad "base," and therefore needed a protective talisman; the other was worried about the limited capital for building his cozy nest and badly needed a helping hand. Therefore, the two easily found accord and quickly became intimate friends. Li wanted to contract for the construction of buildings, whereas Peng went everywhere to get in touch with people and canvass them. When Li's construction team entered Shenzhen, Peng immediately provided conveniences. The members of the team had no special pass and were "blocked" by the border defense. Peng "intervened" for them at once. By every means, Peng also helped to transfer the relatives of the construction team members from Wuchuan to Shenzhen, to say nothing of their eating and drinking. Li was an "expert" in speculating and securing his personal gain. Before Peng asked, Li actively promised to help Peng in building his residence free of charge.

However, while the two were indulging in their wishful thinking, the department responsible for the work discovered Li's illegal economic activities and decided to check his accounts and transfer him from Shenzhen. Peng was burning with impatience when he heard the news. His dream of relying on Li to build his residence would then vanish so, of course, he could not let this matter drop. Hence, he decided to positively "launch an attack." During September 1980, Peng spread the rumor that Li borrowed a lot of money from him, with the result that he was unable to build his residence. At the same time, Li echoed Peng by telling the members of the construction team that he really borrowed a sum of 10,000 yuan. After that, at the instigation of Peng Guoxian, they forged a receipt showing that Li owed 12,070 yuan and tried to pass it on to Mai, who was in charge of the department responsible for the work of the construction team.

This trick by Peng was really formidable; it did place Mai and the construction team in an embarrassing situation. Did Li borrow the 10,000 yuan from Peng? How could they investigate it? To give credence to this sum of money would mean to groundlessly give Peng 10,000 yuan; if his claim was refused, Peng would not give up and would try to put up innumerable obstacles so that the construction team would be unable to gain a foothold in Shenzhen. What could they do? Mai and the construction team had no alternative but to agree to build the residence for Peng as repayment of the debt. Peng Guoxian succeeded in his plot and, starting in October 1980, extorted 11,600 yuan in construction expenses from the construction team. At the end of 1980, he defrauded another 5,400 yuan in construction expenses, which were retained by Li Yangfu. In building Peng's residence, according to the minimum standard, the construction, management and other expenses, not including materials, would come to 6,000-7,000 yuan. But Peng did not even take a penny out of his pocket. The construction team was afraid of Peng's influence, so they dared not mention a word about it.

In this way, by spending only a few thousand yuan, Peng got a fine residence, finished last June, worth several tens of thousand yuan. How happy Peng Guoxian was! In order to celebrate the completion of the building, at the end of June and the beginning of July, he held grand banquets for 4 successive days in honor of guests. The newly built Peng residence was really bustling with activity.

However, Peng Guoxian rejoiced too soon. At the beginning of 1981, Li Yangfu's illegal offenses of embezzling, swindling and speculating came to light. The public security organs of Wuchuan County decided to issue a "wanted" circular for Li Yangfu and sent personnel to Shenzhen to request Peng Guoxian's assistance in bringing Li to justice. Peng, being a public security cadre, overtly agreed but covertly opposed this and harbored Li's evildoing. At the end of July last year, when Li Yangfu once again fled to Shenzhen, Peng, quite aware of this, not only failed to report to the departments concerned, but sheltered Li in his house. The public security department arrested Li in front of Peng's residence on 11 August 1981.

The public security and procuratorial organs of Shenzhen city made thorough investigations and affirmed that Peng Guoxian had broken the criminal law and approved his dentention and arrest. After examination and investigation, the Intermediate People's Court of Shenzhen city reached a court decision according to law on 7 August, sentencing Peng Guoxian to 12 years' imprisonment. As for Peng's illegally built residence, it should be appraised and turned over to the state. Peng Guoxian, this maggot of the special zone, received his deserved end.

UNAUTHORIZED EMPLOYMENT OF RURAL WORKERS VIEWED

[Text] Units owned by the whole people in Guangdong Province have privately hired rural workers in a way assuming quite serious proportions. The number of such workers recruited has reached 340,000.

The situation of indiscriminately hiring temporary rural workers without authorization hampers the readjustment of the national economy and the solution of the problem of placement or employment involving cities. It also does not help in improving economic returns. Furthermore, it makes for unhealthy practices in the matter of recruitment. A factory in Meixian Prefecture hired as many as 447 temporary rural workers, representing more than half of its total number of workers. Most of these workers were also not urgently needed in production.

Some of them had been recommended to the factory through "pull and influence." Some had been employed out of consideration for their being workers' sons and daughters, or local cadres' friends and relatives. The Erqing wooden furniture factory in a county in Foshan Prefecture did not have enough production work to continue operating at full capacity. But it hired 65 peasant workers, 20 of them taken on by the factory manager on the basis of favoritism or nepotism. The situation of recruiting rural workers by some units in Guangzhou is also quite serious.

Various municipalities and counties in the province have been very slow in discharging and evacuating those rural workers employed outside given plans. Some units have combined the removal of these workers with the act of continuing to employ them, ending up with more such workers taken on than discharged. A primary reason is that the leading cadres of some enterprises and units have direct relations with the responsible people of certain departments in charge and leadership organs. Quite a large number of those peasant workers descending upon the city have been taken on through the recommendation of the latter. Recently, the provincial government issued a notification on the strict control of rural workers going to the city to seek work. The planned number of peasant workers to be discharged and evacuated for this year and next year is 200,000. Clear stipulations were laid down for the policy of discharging and evacuating peasant workers in regard to scope and relevant measures. A time limit was set for the accomplishment of given tasks.

HENAN PRODUCTION BRIGADE STUDIES CPC COMMUNIQUE

[Excerpts] The Liuzhuang production brigade of the Qiliying Commune in Xinxiang, Henan, party organizations at various levels in Xian city and the Gansu provincial song and dance troupe are studying the communique of the 7th Plenary Session of the 11th CPC Central Committee and determined to greet the convocation of the 12th CPC National Congress with concrete actions.

When the good news that the 12th CPC National Congress will be convened soon was received in the northern Henan plains, the cadres and commune members of the Liuzhuang production brigade of the Qiliying Commune in Xinxiang County were all the more excited.

The Liuzhuang production brigade became an advanced unit well-known throughout the country in the 1950's. Since the 3d plenary session of the 11th party Central Committee, they have implemented the production responsibility system according to local conditions and followed a course of comprehensive development of agriculture, industry and commerce. Production has grown rapidly in all fields. The brigade's total collective income increased sharply from 1.26 million yuan in 1978 to 2.52 million yuan in 1981. Per capita income reached 2,050 yuan, enabling the people to achieve a relatively comfortable standard of living. More than 95 percent of the families now have television sets, electric fans and radio receivers. Some households have bought washing machines, cameras and motorbikes. A new picture of a socialist countryside prevails everywhere.

On 7 August, (Shi Laihe), secretary of the brigade party branch, said at a commune members meeting: The Party Central Committee has given us so much attention and support; what should we do to greet the convocation of the party's 12th national congress? No sooner had he finished speaking than everyone started to answer. (Wang Zhaoping), leader of the first production team, said: The cotton and corn are growing better this year than before. We should pay attention to late-stage field management, prevent plant diseases and insect pests and strive to set new records in grain and cotton production.

In the last few days, party organizations at various levels in Xian city have organized party members of the masses to study the communique of the 7th plenary session of the 11th party Central Committee. The party members and masses are greatly inspired.

HUNAN CPC IMPOSES PUNISHMENT ON OFFICIALS

Through investigation, it has been confirmed that Liu Xingqi, in collusion with his wife, Yu Jianmei, appropriated state and collective property worth 4,090 yuan when he took the post of secretary of the Taoyuan County CPC Committee. In addition, Yu Jianmei also appropriated more than 1,600 yuan in public funds by exploiting her position. Taking into consideration their mistakes and attitudes, the provincial CPC Committee has decided to put Liu Xingqi on 2 years' probation within the party to mend his ways and has dismissed him from his post as secretary of the provincial forestry scientific research institute and deputyship to the Fifth NPC, and Yu Jianmei was expelled from the party and put on 2 years' probation at work.

Yuan Jialong was charged with privately building a two-story house covering 384.6 square meters by using public property worth more than 7,000 yuan. Taking into consideration his mistake and attitude, it has been decided that he be put on 2 years' probation within the party and be dismissed from his posts as secretary of the Youxian County CPC Committee and director of the standing committee of the county people's congress. His privately-built house was confiscated.

In the circular, the provincial CPC committee pointed out: Having been in the party for years and assumed certain leading posts, both Liu Xingqi and Yan Jialong once made their small contributions to the party. However, being corrupted by corrosive influences of bourgeois ideology, they, ignorant of the party's discipline and state laws, have committed the serious mistake of appropriating a large amount of state and collective property. This is a very painful and striking lesson. In order to draw this lesson, the provincial CPC committee demanded that education in maintaining communist purity and combating corrosive influences of capitalist decadent ideas be carried out among party committees and party members of the whole province.

Radio Commentary

[Summary] The mistakes committed by Liu Xingqi and Yuan Jialong have created a bad impression among the people. The punishment inflicted on them by the provincial CPC committee is absolutely necessary and correct, and also concurs with the wishes of the party and the people.

Considering that they were in the party for years, what led Liu and Yuan to such serious mistakes? The evident reasons are that they have abandoned their efforts of remolding their world outlook, become dizzy with individual egoism, forgotten our party's principles, and lost their communist purity.

Every one of our party members and cadres must draw lessons from their mistakes, consciously make efforts to remold their world outlook and foster a revolutionary outlook of wholeheartedly serving the people in order to work for communism all their life.

We must understand that in the present stage of socialism class struggle will still exist within a certain scope for a long time. We must remain sober-minded and highly vigilant under all circumstances. We must resolutely struggle against all moribund ideas and behavior of seeking private gain at public expense, harming others to benefit oneself, working exclusively for personal gain and having an eye only for money.

Today, our party is a ruling party. Many party members are in possession of power in one district, one department or one unit. We must always bear in mind that all our cadres, whatever their rank, are servants of the people. We can exercise the rights that the people have entrusted in us only for seeking benefits for them. We should by no means seek private gain by taking advantage of our position and power, nor should we do evil things. Those who abuse their power for their own gain will harm not only the party and the people, but also themselves in the end, and will certainly come to a disgraceful end.

Liu Xingqi and Yuan Jialong should, of course, be responsible for their serious mistakes. But this also resulted from a lack of education and supervision which the party organizations concerned should enforce on them. Party organizations at all levels should, therefore, draw due experiences and lessons from the issue. They must be bold in upholding principles, encouraging healthy trends and checking unhealthy ones and resolutely fighting against all evil tendencies and morally degenerate behavior. They should maintain strict discipline against all violations of discipline and law. They should in no way protect evildoers and cover up their deeds.

HUNAN INSPECTS WORK CONCERNING INTELLECTUALS

This inspection showed that over the last few years, and in particular since the third plenary session, our province has been doing well in work concerning intellectuals. Among 128,000 professional workers at grades above assistant lecturer and secondary and primary school backbone teachers, party committees at all levels have implemented relevant policies among 17,000 and helped them solve problems left over from history, accounting for 98.4 percent of the number of people who have such problems; recruited some 11,000 new party members; promoted some 11,000 people to leadership posts; rearranged jobs for 5,700 whose previous jobs did not accord with their qualifications; made arrangements for more than 20,000 couples to live together; and made housing arrangements for more than 37,000 households.

However, this inspection also revealed that some localities and units have not attached sufficient importance to work concerning intellectuals, far from meeting the demand of the CPC Central Committee. The main reason for this is because many leaders still do not fully understand the work on intellectuals. In accordance with this situation, party committees at all levels solved relevant problems during the inspection, speeding up the further implementation of the policy on intellectuals. In Xiangtan, Hengyang and Changde Prefectures and Changsha Municipality, during this inspection, housing arrangements were made for 143 intellectual households, and arrangements were made for 65 couples to live together. According to the statistics of 15 institutes of higher learning, among more than 1,000 intellectuals contacted, the problems raised by 380 people were promptly solved.

HUNAN TAKES MEASURES TO BOOST MOUNTAIN ECONOMY

[Text] Hunan Province has adopted measures to boost economic construction in the mountainous areas. In the past 3 years the provincial CPC committee and the Provincial people's government have mediated 150,000 disputes involving mountain and forest rights and armed fights. They have also handled more than 1,500 cases of indiscriminte felling and chopping of trees. More than 2 million mu of mountain land used for farming has been restored to afforestation and animal husbandry. Materials and funds are being provided to help the people in the mountainous areas develop production.

To cope with problems that have surfaced in the course of construction in the mountainous areas, the Hunan Provincial CPC Committee and the provincial people's government made the following decisions:

1. To reduce the amount of grains to be procured from the mountainous areas so as to lighten the burden of the masses there. Hunan Province has in the past 3 years provided 350 million jin of grain to reduce the procurement quota of the mountainous areas. Recently, the province again decided that beginning in August this year and for the next 3 years in succession the Xiangxi Tujia-Miao Nationality Autonomous Prefecture, where minority people are concentrated, will be supplied with 45 million jin of grain to help the mountainous areas develop forestry and animal husbandry.

2. To implement the forestry policy by doing a good job in issuing certificates to those whose rights to cultivate mountain land and forests have been determined. Since October last year 4.26 million households have been alloted mountain land for cultivation based on their needs.

3. To readjust and reduce the timber production tasks in order to correct the imbalance between felling and cultivation as a step to restore and continuously develop the economy in the mountainous areas.

SICHUAN ON TRANSPROVINCIAL ECONOMIC COOPERATION

HK110855 Chengdu Sichuan Provincial Service in Mandarin 0030 GMT 11 Aug 82

[Text] The industrial enterprises in our province have vigorously promoted economic cooperation with the departments concerned at the central level and in other provinces and municipalities. According to incomplete statistics, the transprovincial economic integrated complexes or cooperative projects so far established total 56, and the industrial enterprises engaged in these integrated complexes and cooperative projects total 90. These newly established economic integrated complexes involve machine building, light industry, the metallurgical industry, the chemical industry and other trades, as well as commune- and brigade-run enterprises.

These complexes and projects are mainly formed by unifying the production and marketing of national and regional specialized companies, or more precisely, by unifying the departments and enterprises concerned in the province with their counterparts in municipalities such as Shanghai and Beijing, and in other provinces such as Guangdong, Zhejiang, Yunnan, Guizhou, Shaanxi, Hubei and so on. There are several forms of unification, which range from: 1) enterprises being transformed to engage in specialized cooperation; 2) technical cooperation; 3) cooperation between processing enterprises and raw materials producing areas; and 4) unified management in production and marketing. These transprovincial economic integrated complexes are a sort of new integrated economic body which has emerged as a response to the present economic readjustment and system reform.

The principles governing unification are: 1) the systems of ownership, the historical relationship and the financial channels of the enterprises involved are not to be changed; and 2) the principle of voluntary participation and mutual benefit must be upheld. Present practice has shown that such a unification can help to pool the manpower, financial resources and material resources of local units to meet the state's urgent needs, can speed up the production of easily marketable commodities and can drive industrial production to develop in the direction of specialized cooperation. Such unification, which is beneficial to the state, the locality and the enterprise, can serve as an ideal means to improve the technical and management levels, to enhance economic returns, to enliven the economy and speed up construction.

SICHUAN MEETING DISCUSSES RURAL PILOT PROJECTS

The meeting held: The pilot projects being run by the provincial and local authorities are aimed at finding a new road suited to the national condition by which economic development can be accelerated and economic returns improved, and the rural areas can increase production and become rich as quickly as possible. In the 4 years 1978-81, the annual average rise in total industrial and agricultural output value in the pilot project counties of Guanghan, Qionglai and Xindu was respectively 200, 800 and 500 percent higher than the average for the 21 years before the reforms. These counties showed big increases in financial revenue, state taxes, and state grain deliveries in 1981, compared with 1977. Average annual income for the peasants rose by over 20 yuan. This year the three counties have continued to maintain a big increase in their economic indexes.

Volumes of facts show that the orientation of rural economic reform is correct and the road is the right one. The party committees and governments at all levels must tangibly strengthen leadership over the reform pilot projects. The various departments must also regard the pilot projects as their affair and actively take part in the reform pilot project work in connection with their own business. The meeting held: It is necessary to get a good grasp of the following measures before the end of this year:

2. The existing joint ventures, combines and commune and brigade enterprises must be rectified in respect of business orientation, leadership groups, and labor and financial management.

3. Seriously carry out trial projects in separating party, government and commune functions on one or two communes. Places where conditions are right can refer to the pilot project experiences of (Banduyuan) Xiang in Xindu County, rectify the party, government, the enterprises, and the poor and lower-middle peasant and CYL organizations, and launch a drive for civilized villages and production teams.

4. On the basis of perfecting and stabilizing the agricultural production responsibility systems, actively develop all types of specialized and key households and promote the development of specialized commodity production.

5. It is necessary to carry out some necessary reforms in commodity circulation in accordance with the actual local conditions.

The meeting put forward a number of major policy problems that need solving while carrying out reforms. For instance, there are the problems in assigning financial and grain responsibilities, the procurement of category-2 agricultural and sideline products, the basic-level supply and marketing cooperative system, definition of jurisdiction in examining and approving joint undertakings, and the operation of agriculture-industry-commerce combines and so on. The provincial CPC committee proposed the principles and methods for solving these problems.

Provincial CPC Committee Secretary Yang Rudai spoke at the meeting.

YUNNAN AGRICULTURAL BANK SUMS UP, ASSIGNS WORK

HK090916 Kunming Yunnan Provincial Service in Mandarin 1100 GMT 6 Aug 82

The meeting held: With the smooth development of the rural economic situation and with further increased bank loans in the rural areas, the finance plans in the rural areas were satisfactorily carried out in the first half of this year. Meanwhile, agricultural banks and credit cooperatives in the afflicted areas facilitated in time various kinds of agricultural loans to support the struggle against floods and droughts. In accordance with the arrangements made by the superior party and government organs, the agricultural banks at all levels exposed and dealt with a number of economic crimes in the rural financial units.

The meeting pointed out: Their work of the second half of 1982 should focus on attaining better economic returns.

1. In continuing the implementation of the principle of actively promoting diversification without any relaxation of grain production, it is necessary to support grain production, diversified undertakings and household sidelines and to promote should development of enterprises run by communes and brigades. Stress must now be laid on supporting the current farm work and helping production teams, enterprises run by communes and brigades as well as commune members to broaden new production channels by doing what they do best and to promote increases in farm, sideline, local and special products which are badly needed by the state and society.

2. Rural markets usually boom in the second half of a year. Therefore, it is necessary to assist rural commercial departments in purchasing farm and sideline products by providing sufficient capital. Meanwhile, to approach the coming brisk markets in the countryside, arrangements should be made earlier to prepare more money in cash and to square accounts for the sale of farm and sideline products. It is necessary to continue to develop bank savings in the rural areas and recover the agricultural loans which are due or overdue.

3. It is necessary to maintain efforts in carrying out the struggle against serious economic crimes to the very end and to adopt some relevant measures to check tax evasion. It is also necessary to have a general checkup on the work of cash management in the rural areas under the unified leadership of local party and government organs and step-by-step and in a planned way to conduct tests at selected points for restructuring financial units in the rural areas in order to perfect all managerial systems so that all financial units will become impassable barriers for all economic criminals.

BEIJING ENTERPRISE CONSOLIDATION WORK REVIEWED

[Text] Since the beginning of this year, Beijing Municipality has conducted consolidation work in industrial and communications enterprises in a planned way, by stages and in groups. The consolidation on this occasion is different from that in the past in that it takes improvement in economic results as a key link and conducts comprehensive management of the enterprises in an effort to bring about a fundamental change in the entire work of the enterprises and to open up a new situation in the enterprises. More than half a year has passed since then. What results have we attained in achieving this objective?

Viewed from a few enterprises where consolidation work has been conducted fairly well, the situation is encouraging. Take the Beijing No 2 rubber factory, for example. Since 1980 its products have been unsalable. Its production and income dropped for 2 consecutive years, its output value dropped by 7.5 percent and its profit dropped by 47.85 percent. Since the beginning of this year, the factory has paid close attention to the consolidation of the enterprise and effected reforms in six aspects: First, it has taken steps in the direction of lighter, thinner, stronger and longer by substituting a new type of synthetic fiber for cotton threads as materials in an attempt to remedy the siutation with new products; second, it has further improved the quality of products in an effort to remedy the quality situation; third, it has attached importance to the manufacture of products in small specifications and quantitiies. It does not mind manufacturing products which other factories are unwilling or unable to produce and it does not take into consideration whether it will bring in large or small profits. It has actively engaged in production in an effort to remedy the situation by manufacturing products in smaller specifications and quantities. Fourth, it has tried to increase the variety of specifications so that customers can have a choice; fifth, it has made very effort to reduce production costs in an effort to remedy the situation with cheaper prices; sixth, it has delivered goods to the doorstep of the customers and does repair work on the spot in an effort to remedy the situation with better technical service. The six points have been fixed as the factory's policies and have succeeded in "invigorating" the No 2 rubber factory. By the end of May, the total output value of the whole factory had amounted to 21.6 million yuan, an increase of 20.9 percent over the same period of last year, and the profit delivered to the state amounted to 2.425 million yuan, an increase of 20.17 percent over the same period of last year. The variety and specifications of products have increased and the costs of most products have been reduced.

A change of fundamental significance in the consolidation of enterprises is to place the starting point and end result on the improvement of economic results. The industrial base of Beijing Municipality is relatively good and is superior to Shanghai in various respects, particularly in factory buildings and equipment. However, its economic results are greatly inferior to those of Shanghai. In 1981 the labor productivity of full-time workers in Beijing was 72.4 percent that of Shanghai; the profit of Beijing generated from each 100 yuan of output value was 96.7 percent that of Shanghai; and in Beijing, the circulating capital quota used for each 100 yuan of output value was 76.2 more than in Shanghai. As soon as consolidation work began, quite a few enterprises examined the gaps between them and the advanced units in similar trades and professions in the country. They came to realize that low efficiency, high consumption, vast waste and poor economic results were serious problems that urgently needed to be solved.

The General sewing machine factory of Beijing Municipality worked out three accounts: first, an account of profit distribution in the past few years; second, the ratio between increase of production and personnel; and third, the gaps between them and similar trades or professions in Shanghai. After performing the calculations, both cadres and masses had sobering thoughts. In the past they only saw the great margin of increased production and the quick increase of profit and were satisfied with the unsubstantial speed and output value; they failed to see the increase in state investment of capital, manpower and material resources and the low labor productivity. By calculations and comparisons, they realized that they could no longer forego conducting consolidation work. Therefore, the factory CPC committee mobilized the masses to fix 30 advanced and rational economic targets as principal targets for the consolidation of the enterprise.

In improving the economic results, it is imperative to achieve the aim of turning out "good quality and readily marketable products of the latest designs at low prices." Two years ago, the Beijing Leather Goods Factory turned out artificial leather suitcases which were better in quality, materials and style than similar products from other places. They sold well in Beijing and 300,000 were sold last year, accounting for 50 percent of the total sales. Toward the end of last year, however, "Double Happiness" brand suitcases made in Tianjin suddenly squeezed their way into the market. They were new in style and cheap in price. They were sold at 45 yuan each, which was 10 percent cheaper than the suitcases made in Beijing. As a result, drastic changes took place in the market situation and the sales of suitcases made in Beijing dropped swiftly. In the first quarter of this year, the city's department stores stopped placing their orders, resulting in an overstock of 11,700 suitcases. In the course of consolidating the enterprise, the Beijing leather goods factory emphasized improving quality and style, paying attention to packaging, reducing production costs and lowering prices. They renovated the corners and keys of the suitcase to make it more beautiful and practical; they also added balls to the wheel at the side of the suitcase to make it roll more easily. In the first national appraisal of suitcase quality through comparison held this year, the Beijing Leather Goods Factory rehabilitated its reputation by winning first place for three of its products. They also took steps to oppose waste and plug loopholes and paid close attention to basic management in order to reduce production costs. They reduced the selling price of the suitcase from 49.7 yuan to 43.7 yuan. In the second quarter of the year, the sales of Beijing-made suitcases surpassed those of Tianjin, and Beijing-made suitcases were once again readily marketable in the Beijing market. Now all 20,000 suitcases produced every month are sold.

The poor management and economic results in many of Beijing's enterprises in the past were to a large extent due to the poor leadership of the leading cadres and the lack of key professional members. In consolidating these enterprises, the municipal CPC committee paid attention to the solution of this key problem. Of the 258 enterprises to be consolidated in the first batch, the leading bodies of 144 enterprises have to be readjusted, and so far 50 of them have been readjusted. Fifty-eight middle-aged and young technical cadres have been promoted in these units. After the readjustment of the organizations, the proportion of members of the leading bodies who are under 45 years of age has risen from 25.6 percent to 34 percent, those who have senior middle school education and above has risen from 31.7 percent to 42.1 percent and the number of professional technical cadres has risen from 19.1 percent to 23.3 percent. The leading body of the Beijing No 9 radio components factory has been readjusted three times. Young "knowledgeable persons" who have both knowledge and drive have been promoted to the leading positions at factory level so that the enterprise is increasingly well managed. Experiences gained in many enterprises have proved that without a large number of leading cadres who are ideologically emancipated, proficient in professional work and well versed in management, it would be completely impossible to consolidate the enterprises well.

SHANXI RIBAO ON REMOVING 'SPIRITUAL RUBBISH'

HK130815 Taiyuan SHANXI RIBAO in Chinese 2 Aug 82 p 3

[Article by Zhu Fuxun [4376 4395 6064]: "Guard Against Spiritual Sugar-Coated Bullets; Sweep Away Spiritual Rubbish"]

[Text] Following the invention of steel bullets in modern warfare, sugar-coated bullets have also emerged. Obviously, sugar-coated bullets with which the bourgeoisie attack people have greater antipersonnel power than the "soft knife" in ancient times.

Sugar-coated bullets are rich in variety and type but, generally speaking, there are only two types: one is material and the other spiritual. Both are extremely corrosive. Money, beautiful women, foreign goods and so on are tangible material sugar-coated bullets. When they assail us, it is generally easy for us to recognize them clearly. Decadent capitalist ideas and ways of life are in the category of spiritual sugar-coated bullets. Being intangible, it is not so easy for us to reocgnize them clearly when they assail us. Therefore, while guarding against these two kinds of sugar-coated bullets, it is more necessary for us to guard against the spiritual sugar-coated bullets.

On the eve of nationwide liberation, Comrade Mao Zedong predicted at the Second Plenary Session of the Seventh CPC Central Committee that after our party became the party in power, we would be confronted with the danger of being attacked by sugar-coated bullets. A few weak-willed CPC members would be defeated by sugar-coated bullets. He exhorted the whole party by saying: "The comrades must be taught to remain modest, prudent and free from arrogance and rashness in their style of plain living and hard struggle." Sure enough, after the nationwide victory, some people within the party were defeated by sugar-coated bullets. Former secretaries of the Tianjin Prefectural CPC Committee Liu Qingshan and Zhang Zishan, who were familiar to all, were such typical representatives. They were worthy of the name of hero for standing up to the enemy's steel bullets in those years. Why did they fall victim to bourgeois sugar-coated bullets after entering the cities? If we review the process of their degeneration, we shall be able to see that as soon as Liu Qingshan and Zhang Zishan entered the city, they were dazzled by the world with its myriad temptations, which engendered in them the tendency to seek pleasure. The lawbreaking capitalists precisely took advantage of this opportunity and let fly sugar-coated bullets in quick succession. They were first struck by spiritual sugar-coated bullets so that a breach was made in their ideology; later, they were dragged into the mire with money and beautiful women. The result was that their individualism was so malignantly inflated that their souls became rotten to the core. They became embezzlers who worked hand in glove with capitalists and were put to death in accordance with the law during the movements against the "three evils."

If, under the conditions in which the exploiting classes still existed in the early period of the founding of the PRC, the emergence of some individual scum, such as Liu Qingshan and Zhang Zishan, who were struck by sugar-coated bullets, was not surprising, then is there still a question of being struck by sugar-coated bullets today, 30 years after the founding of the PRC, long after the exploiting classes have been eliminated? The fact that there are now many crimes in the economic field has proved that the question of sugar-coated bullets not only still exists, but is also fairly serious. We are now confronted with a serious struggle between corrosion from capitalist ideas and the anticorrosion of socialist ideas.

The current struggle against serious criminal activities in the economic field is similar in nature to the movements against the "three evils" in the early period after the founding of the PRC. Both are struggles to resist corrosion and are important manifestations of class struggle.

However, due to changes in the historical conditions, the struggle has some new features. Under the present historical conditions, the exploiting class has ceased to exist as a class. However, the decadent ideas of the exploiting class are still sending forth bad smells and the remnant elements of the exploiting class are still engaged in various activities. Because of various internal and external factors, class struggle will still exist within a certain scope over a long period of time. It is entirely necessary for us to practice an external open-door policy and a domestic policy of enlivening the economy. However, the capitalist "West wind" also takes this opportunity to repeatedly assail us with various pornographic or pernicious books and periodicals that reflect decadent capitalist ideas and ways of life as well as sound and video products that infiltrate into our country through various channels. A few lawbreaking elements are precisely making use of these spiritual sugar-coated bullets to corrupt people ideologically and in their way of life. Did not Hao Qiang and company who were arrested in Taiyuan by the public security department last year make use of the pornographic movies smuggled into the country from Hong Kong to peddle the spiritual rubbish of the West, make profit, harm people and seriously contaminate the social atmosphere? This case once again shows that the Taihang Mountains cannot serve as a natural protective screen to shelter us from the "West wind" that it is not calm and tranquil in Niangzi oasis and that it is necessary to wage struggle against corrosion not only in the coastal areas, but also in the hinterland, like Shanxi. We should note that these spiritual sugar-coated bullets which propagate sex and violence have greater corrosive power on youths. According to statistics from an institute of reeducation through labor, half of the youths who are going through reeducation through labor embarked on the road of hooliganism and theft through reading pornographic books and periodicals and hand-copied obscene works.

Some people hold that the decadent music of Hong Kong and Macao is very melodious, that the pornographic books and periodicals of the West are real eye-openers and that there is nothing to worry about. Is this really so? No. People cannot help calling to mind the "sensual mirror" in chapter 12 of the "Dream of the Red Chamber." Jia Rui, a profligate son of the rich, got the mirror. When he looked at its reverse, the skeletons he saw in it sent cold shivers down his spine. However, when he looked at the obverse side of the mirror, he saw Feng Jie, who he missed day and night, smiling at him. The more he looked at it, the happier he was. He never dreamed that he would die after he had looked at it three times. As a matter of fact, when you are interested in sexy music or pernicious books and periodicals, your soul is being swallowed by the poisonous germs of the bourgeoisie. If you do not wake up to reality promptly, you will have a lamentable end, like Jia Rui.

The capitalist spiritual sugar-coated bullets are likewise exercising a corrosive influence on some veteran party members and cadres. Some veteran ranking cadres who were conquered neither by enemies with guns nor by the "gang of four" in those years have been defeated by sugar-coated bullets in the past few years. Cheng Zhanbiao, former responsible member of the advisers office under the Yunnan Provincial government, was a veteran cadre who joined the CPC in 1933. However, he became dizzy when the capitalist "West wind" assailed him. He was disarmed ideologically, which caused the dike of his soul to collapse. He was doubtful about the communism in which he had believed for several decades and he degenerated into a muddleheaded person who was blinded by greed. He forgot not only the righteousness of a communist, but also the minimum moral principles of an honest person. He went so far as to assist his own daughter to become the third concubine of a Hong Kong merchant. What a striking similarity between him and the landlord Feng Yunqing in "Midnight," who told his daughter to "go through the dog's door" at the big stockbroker's! It can thus be seen that a party member or cadre will do any sort of ugly and evil things devoid of a national and personal character once he is struck by spiritual sugar-coated bullets and has been corroded by capitalist ideas.

French writer Romain Rolland said: "The most formidable enemy is to be without a strong conviction." Martyr Fang Zhimin expressed it more profoundly when he said: "The enemy can only chop off my head; he will never be able to shake my conviction: This is because the doctrine we believe in is the truth of the universe:" Strong conviction in communism is precisely a spiritual pillar and a source of strength for the revolutionaries. If we waver in this question of fundamental stand, then we have been struck by capitalist spiritual sugar-coated bullets and have been corroded by capitalist ideas. There is a danger of peaceful evolution!

The struggle against attack by sugar-coated bullets and the corrosive influence of capitalist ideas is a protracted one. Every comrade must repeatedly stand up to the new and severe tests. Practice has repeatedly proved that capitalist spiritual sugar-coated bullets are not formidable. Only a few individuals have been corroded by them. As far as the majority of revolutionaries who "resist corrosion and refuse to be contaminated" are concerned, these sugar-coated bullets have, after all, no effect. They can only play the role of strengthening our immunity and "transforming decadent elements into miraculous ones." A saying goes: "A heart without defects constitutes an iron wall." This, after all, is a golden saying for resisting corrosion and preventing degeneration. Let us look at those people who were defeated by sugar-coated bullets. The reason for their generation into muddleheaded fellows lies chiefly in their world outlook, which was not healthy from the start. The capitalist spiritual sugar-coated bullets are simply an external factor bringing about their degeneration. "The collapse of a dike orginates from an ant hole and the release of air is caused by a prick of the needle." There is also a process leading from quantitative change to qualitative change in their degeneration. Therefore, the key to resisting corrosion lies in remodling our world outlook and building a firm steel dike in the depth of our souls. After the October Revolution, Lenin called the struggle against capitalist corrosion "a special war." In order to achieve a complete victory in this "special war," it is most essential to take up the powerful weapon of Marxism-Leninism-Mao Zedong Thought, constantly raise our ideological consciousness, preserve the purity of communism and strengthen the consciousness of resisting corrosion and preventing degeneration. Naturally, in order to win this "special war," it is also necessary to constantly sweep away the spiritual rubbish of the exploiting classes and carry out comprehensive management with the coordination of the various quarters. With respect to the pornographic or pernicious books and periodicals, sound and video products and so on, it is imperative to eradicate them and ban them totally; with respect to persons who commit crimes by spreading rubbish, it is imperative to punish them according to law. More important, the party organizations at various levels should step up ideological and political work, fill all ideological and cultural positions with socialist ideology, enrich people's spiritual life and step up the building of spiritual civilization. Only in this way will it be possible for us to achieve a glorious victory and perform new meritorious deeds in the "special war."

HEILONGJIANG MEETING ON ENTERPRISE MANAGEMENT

SK110246 Harbin Provincial Service in Mandarin 1100 GMT 10 Aug 82

Since the 3d Plenary Session of the 11th CPC Central Committee, our province's enterprise democratic management work has undergone three stages including reactivation, readjustment and improvement. Following the promulgation of the provisional regulations concerning the state industrial enterprises' workers' congresses by the CPC Central Committee and the tate ouncil, all localities have further strengthened leadership and witnessed rapid development in this work. At present, over 80 percent of enterprises in the province have instituted the workers' congress system and the scope of popularization is gradually expanding, developing from industrial, communications, capital construction and forestry enterprises to state farms and financial and trade enterprises, from large and medium-size enterprises to small enterprises, and from cities to towns and townships. A large number of democratic management advanced units have emerged. Some 30 units introduced their experiences at the meeting.

During discussions, comrades attending the meeting maintained that, despite the province's remarkable achievements in promoting enterprise democratic management, it still falls far short of the requirements of the provisional regulations concerning the state industrial enterprises' workers' congresses. At present, some enterprises have failed to bring into full play the role of staff and workers as masters of their own affairs and some even have held workers' congresses perfunctorily. In view of this situation, the meeting stressed: The work emphasis in the next step is to improve and perfect the workers' congress system, to wholeheartedly rely on the staff and workers to run the socialist enterprises well, to realistically raise the leadership and managerial levels, to enhance the political quality and technical standards of staff and workers and to improve economic benefits.

The meeting was held in Acheng County on 3-8 August. Leading comrades of the provincial CPC committee including Li Lian, Chen Junsheng and Chen Jianfei, attended and spoke at the meeting. Also attending the meeting were prefectural and municipal CPC committee responsible comrades, propaganda department directors, prefectural, municipal and county economic commission chairmen and trade union chairmen, responsible persons of provincial level departments, committees, offices and bureaus, leading cadres of grassroots enterprises and representatives of staff and workers.

HEILONGJIANG COMMENTS ON WORKERS' CONGRESS SYSTEM

SK110553 Harbin Heilongjiang Provincial Service in Mandarin 1100 GMT 10 Aug 82

[Station commentator's article: "We Must Respect and Support the Staff and Workers To Become Masters of Their Own Affairs"]

[Excerpt] The workers' congress system is a basic organizational means to arouse the sense of responsibility of staff and workers as masters of the country, to bring into play their initiative in becoming masters of their own affairs and to run socialist enterprises well. Through this system, the staff and workers can exercise the democratic rights of being masters of their own affairs and of participating in enterprise managerial work. At present, only 25-30 percent of enterprises in the province have done a good job in implementing this system. Some enterprises workers' congresses have failed to help solve existing problems. This is mainly because some leading cadres of enterprises have a poor understanding of wholeheartedly relying on the staff and workers to run the socialist enterprises.

Some leading cadres of enterprises lack the mass viewpoint and a democratic work style and are used to patriarchal leadership. They have failed to put leaders in a correct relationship to the masses. Whether we can rely on the masses to run the socialist enterprises well is not only a matter concerning the viewpoint of the masses but also a matter concerning their political stand. In a socialist country, staff and workers are the masters of enterprises. Failure to respect their political position and a weakening of their democratic rights will dampen their sense of responsibility as masters of the country and their production enthusiasm.

Many enterprises in our province have the glorious tradition of relying on the staff and workers to strengthen management. Today, in the course of building modern, powerful socialist country, we should all the more inherit and promote the democratic work style, respect the opposition of staff and workers as masters in managing enterprises, bring into play their initiative in becoming masters of their own affairs and continuously raise the production and managerial levels.

JILIN OFFICIAL DISCUSSES PEOPLE'S LIVELIHOOD

SK111114 Changchun Jilin Provincial Service in Mandarin 1100 GMT 10 Aug 82

[Excerpts] Since the 3d plenary session of the 11th party Central Committee, the party and the government have been very concerned with the improvement of the people's living conditions. In the course of readjusting the national economy, they have vigorously accelerated building of residences for workers and staff, commercial networks, urban public utilities, cultural, educational and public health undertakings and other service projects for people's livelihood, resulting in remarkable successes. Comrade (Lu Shaochun), vice chairman of the provincial financial and trade committee, recently was interviewed by our reporter on this work. Their recorded talks are as follows:

[Begin recording] Question: Comrade (Lu Shaochun), since the 3d plenary session of the 11th party Central Committee, what has our province done to improve the people's livelihood?

Answer: Although faced with financial difficulties and rapid population growth, our province allocated 3,928,000,000 yuan and funds to improve the people's living conditions inthe 3 years from 1979 to 1981. These funds were mainly used in the following ways:

1. Adjusting the basic wages and providing bonuses. From 1979 to 1981, some 583 million yuan of funds were used.

2. Raising the purchasing price of agricultural and sideline products. In these 3 years, the peasants increased their income by 1,138,000,000 yuan from increases in purchasing prices for agricultural and sideline products, additional prices for over-quota products and selling their products at negotiated prices. On average, each peasant got 76.65 yuan more income in each of these 3 years.

3. Expanding labor employment. In the 3 years, some 1,174,000 jobless people were employed by various enterprises through various channels. Of them, 636,000 were employed by the units owned by the people. The added wages totalled 128.9 million yuan.

4. Easing the burden on peasants. From 1979 to 1981, the province reduced and remitted over 67 million yuan of agricultural taxes for disaster-stricken communes and brigades in rural areas, impoverished brigades, communes and brigades in border areas and the plants and teams run by educated youths.

5. Subsidizing prices for grain and oil. Although the purchasing prices for grain and oil were increased by the state, the market prices have remained unchanged in order not to affect the livelihood of the urban population. To make up for the balance between purchasing and market prices, the province must pay a large amount of funds each year. In these 3 years, over 1,144,000,000 yuan were used to make up the difference.

6. Subsidizing the prices for nonstaple food and some other products. From 1979 to 1981, over 552 million yuan were used to subsidize the prices of oil, eggs, chickens, vegetables and coal consumed by the urban populations, and the prices of washing powder, soap, and cloth consumed by both the urban and rural population.

7. Expanding housing for workers and staff. In these 3 years, the province built 6.03 million square meters of residences for the urban population, equal to the total in the 10 years from 1968 to 1978. Some 730 million yuan were invested in this field, of which, 210 million yuan were covered by the state budget.

8. Developing urban public utilities. Some 102 million yuan were used to build public utilities in these 3 years.

[Question: Since the state used so much money in this regard, was the livelihood of the urban and rural people improved?

Answer: Yes, the livelihood of the urban and rural people has improved. It is mainly manifested in the following ways:

1. Wages of workers and staff increased. The average wages of workers and staff of the units owned by the people and the urban collectives were 653 yuan in 1978 and 775 yuan in 1981. Average wage increases of each worker and staff member were 122 yuan, an increase of 18.7 percent.

2. Peasants' income increased. The 1981 income of each peasant averaged 297 yuan, an increase of 73 percent over 1978.

3. Savings deposits of the urban and rural population greatly increased.

4. Employment expanded and people supported by their families decreased in number. Owing to the increased employment, the number of people supported by each laborer in urban areas decreased from 2.3 in 1978 to 1.85 in 1981.

5. Food consumption of urban and rural people increased. Comparing 1981 with 1978, the consumption of edible oil for each person increased from 5.2 jin to 7.7 jin, and the consumption of pork increased from 12.9 jin to 22.9 jin.

The state has tried its best and allocated a large amount of funds to improve people's livelihood in the past few years. However, due to the backwardness of our state, many problems left over from the past several years still exist. Some practical problems in people's livelihood need solving. These problems will be solved one by one on the basis of increased production.

As to religious work at present and in the future, efforts must be made to conduct education on patriotism and socialism among the religious believers, guard against and overcome the erroneous tendencies of letting things drift, resist the infiltration of international religious reactionary forces and implement the policy of religious freedom in an all-round manner.

JILIN ON IMPLEMENTING RURAL RESPONSIBILITY SYSTEM

SK070832 Changchun Jilin Provincial Service in Mandarin 2200 GMT 6 Aug 82

[Text] According to Hongse Sheyuan Bao, the rural areas of our province universally introduced the various forms of the production responsibility system in 1979 and 1980. After continuous readjustments and improvements, the system has displayed tremendous strength in promoting farm production. To date, 79 percent of the production teams in our province have adopted the system of remuneration according to output, while 21 percent implemented the system of remuneration on the basis of contracts and production quotas.

The masses implemented the system on their own initiative in line with the appeal of the central authroties. This shows that the responsibility system accords with the trend of history and the interests of the peasants. Under the guidance of the line adopted at the third plenary session of the party, millions upon millions of peasants have fully displayed their intelligence and wisdom and created many forms of the responsibility system to suit their specific local conditions. After being summarized by the party central committee, these diverse forms of the system were soon adopted by various localities. The implementation of the responsiblity system has played a tremendous role in promoting farming production.

In 1981 our province conducted a cross section survey of 663 production teams. According to the survey results, 43 teams practicing the system of contracitng work tasks to individual households registered a 18 percent increase in their combined output compared to the average figure for the previous 3 years. Their combined income increased 35.8 percent, total production cost dropped 20.3 percent, above-quota grains sold to the state at additional prices increased 74.4 percent, collective accumulation increased 54 percent and per capita income increased 84 percent.

The 23 teams practicing the system of grain ration plots had a 4.4 percent increase in total output. Their combined income increased 35.8 percent, total production cost dropped 11.3 percent, above-quota grains sold to the state at additional prices increased 166.4 percent, collective accumulation increased by 72.4 percent and per capita income doubled.

The 130 teams practicing the system of assigning output quotas to work groups achieved a 13.7 percent increase in total output. Their total income increased 21.3 percent, total production cost dropped 4.4 percent, above-quota grains sold to the state at additional prices increased 25.5 percent and per capita income increased 38.7 percent.

This shows that the implementation of the various forms of the responsibility system accords with the present situation of the productive forces and the political consciousness of the peasants. This system is able to mobilize the peasants' enthusiasm for production, tallies with our national conditions and genuinely reflects the party's ideological line of seeking truth from facts.

[Text] Dalian, August 6 (XINHUA) -- Liaoning Province plans in the coming years to expand economic and trade relations and technical cooperation with foreign companies, according to Chen Ying, director of the provincial foreign trade bureau. Technical transformation of non-metallic mines and development of new diposits will be accelerated, the director said. The province also hopes to expand exports of talcum, calcined and kilned magnesites and borax.

Liaonings textile and light industries will concentrate on improving the quality of products and adding new designs and varieties. Liaoning Province now trades with 130 countries and regions, he said.

LIANONING EDUCATION ACHIEVEMENTS REVIEWED

SK110759 Shenyang Lianoning Provincial Service in Mandarin 1100 GMT 10 Aug 82

1. Rapid progress in developing vocational education has been made. For some 3 years, while vigorously readjusting and reducing senior middle schools, the province has established over 600 vocational and agricultural middle schools which have accommodated over 70,000 students, changing the unitary structure of secondary education. The province has begun to operate key elementary and middle schools, readjust junior middle schools and perfect the rational structure of general secondary education.

2. Teachers' position has been upgraded gradually. In recent years, over 10,000 elementary and middle school teachers across the province have been admitted into the party and their pay has scored over a two-fold increase. Teachers in schools run by the people have received special supplements from the state since 1979 in addition to obtaining workpoints from their production team, resulting in great improvement in their livelihood. In recent years, over 5,000 teacher households in urban areas across the province have moved into new houses. Housing problems of teachers at county level or in rural areas have also been handled. A large number of model teachers have emerged among elementary and middle schools in the province. Over 200 teachers have been commended as advanced home class teachers and model instructors of Young Pioneers.

3. Sustained efforts have been made to improve teaching conditions. The province invested over 320 million yuan from 1979 to 1981 in building or repairing school houses and had completed over 4 million square meters of floor space in school building construction and repairs. The provincial, prefectural and municipal education departments have appropriated over 30 million yuan to buy teaching instruments, resulting in great improvements of teaching conditions. Through efforts exerted by teachers and students, many middle schools have a new look by afforesting, beautifying and purifying their environment. This will favorably contribute to training new successors for the generation with all-round development of morality, intelligence and physical fitness.

Thanks to afforestation, some 100,000 mu of sandy arable land has been improved. During the 1979-1980 period, the average annual increase in grain output was 29.6 percent and the annual income from forestry stood at 400,000 yuan. By 1981 this county had accumulated 910,000 cubic meters of timber valued at 96 million yuan. [Changchun Jilin Provincial Service in Mandarin 2200 GMT 12 Aug 82 SK]

XIE HUAIDE SPEAKS ON SHAANXI RURAL CONSTRUCTION

[Report: "It Is Necessary To Do a Good Job in Agricultural Zoning and Rural Town Construction -- Comrade Xie Huaide Speaks at Provincial Conference on Agricultural Zoning and Rural Town Construction"]

[Text] The provincial conference on agricultural zoning and rural town construction convened by the provincial party committee and government on 5 July in Xian ended on 14 July.

This conference mainly solved the problem of strengthening leadership over agricultural zoning and rural town construction, summed up and exchanged experiences, arranged the work for the future and demanded that the leadership of the party and government at various levels do a good job in agricultural zoning and rural town construction, which are the two main tasks of the present work in rural areas, and to score achievements in this work.

Attending the conference were responsible comrades from the provincial party committee and government, including Yu Mingtao, Xie Huaide, Lu Jianren, Yu Ming, Bai Jinian, Liu Keng, Li Lianbi, Sun Kehua, Zhang Bin and Chen Ming. Provincial party committee Secretary Xie Huaide made an important speech at the closing of the conference. The following is an extract of this speech.

Since the 3d Plenary Session of the 11th CPC Central Committee and following the thorough implementation of the party's line, principles and policies, there have appeared in the rural areas of our province "scientific fever" and "fever for building houses." In order to develop production in depth and breadth, the broad masses of peasants urgently need science and technology. At the same time, with enough grain and money, peasants also urgently demand the improvement of their living conditions. Many places have been characterized by a prosperous situation in which almost every family has begun building a new house with materials prepared. In order to meet the peasants' demand and solve well new problems that have cropped up in the rural town construction and further develop the excellent situation in rural areas, it is imperative for us to do a good job in agricultural zoning and rural town construction, which represent the two major tasks in the work in rural areas.

First, about agricultural zoning. In 1980 the party Central Committee put forth the correct principle of "relying on policies and science" for developing agriculture. Through practice, the various forms of the agricultural production responsibility system have developed from broad development to the stage of stabilization and perfection. The next step is to rely on science. In the long term, our agriculture can be transformed from extensive farming to intensive farming, and from unitary operations to an overall development of agriculture, forestry, animal husbandry, sideline production and fisheries, and comprehensive operation of agriculture, industry and commerce only by relying on modern science and technology. For agriculture, to rely on science it is imperative first of all to do a good job in basic work that includes investigations on agricultural resources and agricultural zoning. That is to say, we must be acquainted with the quantity and quality of agricultural resources and the relationship of mutual dependence and conditions between quantity and quality and work out a relatively scientific plan for agricultural zoning according to the specific conditions of each region.

To the comrades who are responsible for guiding agricultural production, this work in fact means to understand and grasp objective law, and to prevent the mistakes of giving guidance blindly. It represents the basic work for correctly guiding agricultural production, and is the first step in implementing the principles of agriculture relying on science.

Thanks to the hard work carried out over the past few years by the leadership and cadres at various levels and the broad masses of scientific workers, we have made considerable achievements and accumulated good experiences in agricultural zoning work in our province and consequently we have made a good start for future work. Some comrades from regional and prefectural levels said at the conference that we have quietly undertaken a significant and big undertaking. The evaluation made by the provincial planning commission in its work report is proper and I totally agree with this evaluation. The proposal to basically complete the zoning of prefectural areas in the province in 1983 and to arrange the work for finalization in 1984 are feasible. Various places must make arrangements according to the specific conditions and persist in carrying out this work quickly under the premise that quality is guaranteed.

"Quality is the lifeline in agricultural zoning" is the basic experience that has been gained in carrying out this work over the past few years. In order to ensure quality, it is imperative first of all to investigate the resources with a strict scientific attitude and according to standard requirements and this practice is the basis for doing a good job in carrying out zoning work. Various statistics and reference materials must be accurate and scientific; otherwise, they will be more harmful than not carrying out investigation. Fake science is more dangerous than being unscientific. Second, we must comprehensively analyze and systematically study reference materials. Third, we must proceed from reality, sum up experiences in guiding agricultural production that has been carried out since the founding of New China and the traditional experiences of the masses and probe into the objective law of developing agriculture in localities. Fourth, work out all feasible planning for agricultural zoning. Agricultural zoning is a key item of state research work; it is a big undertaking for studying and applying science, and therefore must be carried out in a down-to-earth way.

Do a good job in making use of the achievements of agricultural zoning. This is the basic purpose of carrying out agricultural zoning as well as a continuous development in carrying out zoning work. It is imperative to closely combine investigations, zoning, planning and utilization of agricultural resources; we can in no way stop this work midway or we will cause most serious waste. The counties that are carrying out zoning work must persist in the principle of carrying out investigations, zoning and utilization simultaneously. The counties that have completed zoning work must concentrate their efforts on making use of the achievements of this work. First of all, it is imperative for them, on the basis of zoning work, to work out general planning at the county level and make overall arrangements with regard to hills, water resources, farmland, forests, roads, villages and agriculture, forestry, animal husbandry, sideline production and fisheries. In carrying out planning it is necessary to deal with the main contradictions and to spare no efforts to realize economic results as soon as possible. Wugong County made a breakthrough in carrying out zoning work by concentrating its efforts on combining agriculture and animal husbandry. In working out planning and in readjusting location it is necessary to consider the overall situation and overcome the one-sided view of stressing the importance of the partial situation and neglecting the overall situation. In making use of the achievements that have been made in zoning work, we must sum up experiences promptly and consequently improve these achievements so that they will have practical and scientific signifance in guiding work.

Second, about rural town construction. Rural town construction is related to the direct interests of the broad masses of peasants. Following constant development of the rural economy and gradual improvement of the peasants' living standard, peasants have urgently demanded the improvement of their standard of living and environment and the setting up of more industrial, commercial, cultural, health and public welfare facilities.

Therefore, it is necessary to change our customs and habits, and to gradually turn backward rural areas into advanced rural areas and further into modern and highly civilized socialist new rural areas. In the long term, to do a good job of rural town construction in no way merely means building houses; in fact, it is a big undertaking of gradually eliminating the difference between rural and urban areas and between workers and peasants. Rural town construction involves a broad range of activities calling for strong policy involving complex problems, and therefore the party committees and governments at various levels must fully understand this situation.

It is imperative to do a good job in rural town construction planning. All of the more than 2,500 people's communes, several thousand rural towns, more than 30,000 production brigades and the more than 100,000 villages in our province will be gradually improved and expanded on the basis of promoting production. This is unprecedentedly large-scale construction, and therefore it can only be done well through scientific planning and correct leadership. The building of houses in rural areas in now characterized by lack of planning, blind construction and occupation of farmland at will. On the one hand, this situation shows that some peasants are still anarchic and on the other hand, it shows that we did not give active guidance and we lack an overall plan.

In orderto do a good job of planning, it is necessary for various regions and municipalities to investigate each county and district and classify them according to their different situations. That is to say, the number of houses built, the manpower and material and financial resources that can be supplied, and the actual pace of construction of houses must all be investigated. Under the premise of correctly handling the relationship between production construction and housing construction and defining the number of houses and the pace of the construction each year, we must work out relatively practical 5-year plans and 10-year assumptions. The key in the planning must include rationally using and saving land. In carrying out rural town construction, we must make the best use of old villages and reform them so as to avoid mass removal and expanding area. Over the past few years, a large amount of land has been occupied by the enterprises run by people's communes and peasant villages and this situation of wasting land must be stopped. In general, it is better to work out specific rural town planning and such planning must not be too complicated. The planning will be effective as long as we are able to arrange rational location and control the use of land. We must make models for peasants to follow so that rural town planning can be accomplished as soon as possible.

It is imperative to grasp well the work of rural housing construction. Big changes have taken place in the rural areas since liberation and a big improvement has been made in living conditions. Since the convening of the 3d Plenary Session of the 11th CPC Central Committee, several hundred thousand peasants have moved into their new houses and consequently new rural towns have appeared. But we must understand that in quite a number of the places in our province, particularly in remote mountain regions, people are still living in very backward conditions. In these places, people are living together with livestock, with their houses smoky, dingy, damp and unhygienic. Some people are still living in thatched cottages and stone caves. Some local and other diseases are caused by the living conditions and environment. First of all, the building of houses must be centered on improving backward conditions, improving living conditions and environment, improving people's physical condition and promoting production. Second, technical guidance must be strengthened with regard to the building undertaken by the peasants who are relatively rich so that the building can be carried out according to plan and the project can be stepped up. In rural town construction, we will gradually be able to build houses economically that are suited to the rural situation, sound in structure and good in appearance. This project must also aid in cleaning up rural scenery, beautify the environment and be coupled with access roads and drainage facilities. These projects must be rationally located and save land.

We must sum up peasant's experiences in building houses and select and popularize housing that is economical, practical, of good appearance and with a sound structure, and that is welcomed by the peasants. The material problems for rural town construction must mainly be solved by localities under the principle of self-reliance. We must economize on timber and take active measures to use prefabricated reinforced concrete structures and substitute materials for steel window frames and steel structures and we must also pay attention to making and using complete sets of structures. Felling trees at will must be strictly prohibited.

We must train people for construction in a big way. Rural town construction urgently needs a great number of professional technicans. The most realistic method is to fully display the role of the existing technical force in rural areas and at the same time to gradually train many technicians in a planned way. The provincial and regional departments concerned and scientific and research, education and design units must step up technical guidance and be active in planning and designing rural town construction as well as in training technicians. The project of rural town construction must be combined with reform of the secondary school education system and when conditions permit, a secondary school may be changed into a construction school, or rural town planning and construction courses may be set up in existing schools. Short-term training courses may also be given for people to combine their study with practice and to practice what they have learned.

The wrong tendency of occupying farmland and damaging rural town construction must be resolutely curbed. The area of cultivated land in our province has decreased from more than 68 million mu in the 1950's to less than 57 million mu at present, with an average of 2 mu per capita. If we still do not pay serious attention to this situation, it will cause unimaginable consequences. The State Council last year issued an "urgent announcement on curbing occupation of farmland in building houses in rural areas" and this year it issued "regulations on the management of land used in building houses in rural towns" and it is imperative for various places to conscientiously implement these directives and work according to them. This year, the government at various levels must in general check and handle the cases of occupation of farmland in building houses in rural areas and serious punishment must be given to those typical cases with bad effects; we cannot be soft-hearted. Land occupation must get strict approval.

Third, about stepping up leadership over agricultural zoning and rural town construction. Rural areas are now facing heavy tasks and consequently it is imperative for party organizations and governments at various levels to make overall arrangements for various tasks. Present problems include overcoming slackness and weakness in the work of some leading groups; thse groups must dare to and be good at giving guidance, and must also aspire to create new situations. Agricultural zoning and rural town construction represent work that is related to the overall situation and therefore it is imperative for party organizations and governments at various levels to put this work on their agenda and strengthen their guidance. A responsible comrade must be assigned for this work while there are first and second people in command that must be acquainted with the progress of this work, and they must also take part in some study and investigation. Senior leaders must preside over the discussions on major questions in agricultural zoning and rural town construction where those attending are encouraged to fully air their differing views so as to draw correct conclusions. Through agricultural zoning, the leadership at various levels must gradually change their past practice of guiding agricultural production solely through administrative orders to the work method characterized by a scientific process of investigating -- zoning -- stipulation -- planning -- implementation (experimentation). Working organizations at various levels for agricultural zoning and rural town construction must be strengthened. The situation in which leadership is very weak and no one cares must be changed as soon as possible so as to solve actual problems in this work. Publicizing departments such as newspapers and broadcasting and TV stations must use various forms to publicize the significance, achievements and experiences of agricultural zoning and rural town construction. Agricultural zoning and rural town construction are new things and new subjects and therefore we must modestly learn and sum up experiences so that we will be able to constantly improve our leadership and accomplish these two important tasks.

TZU LI WAN PAO ON REAGAN ARMS SALES DECISION

[Text] During a recent meeting at the White House with 24 U.S. senators and congressmen, President Reagan indicated that if the Chinese Communists attack Taiwan, the United States will do everything it can to defend Taiwan and will make all-out efforts to counter their scheme to attack Taiwan. Regarding the so-called "Shanghai communique" No 2, President Reagan said: What the Chinese Communists got is a mere formality, but Taiwan got the essence. We were gratified by this news report. This is how we have always thought it should be.

Nevertheless, since Reagan became President, we have felt both happiness and anxiety. The former has been caused by encouraging news from the U.S. White House; the latter has been caused by the fact that Reagan's good will toward us has been demonstrated by words only, not actions. For instance, when Reagan announced his policy on arms sales to the Republic of China last December, he indicated that high-performance FX fighter aircraft will not be sold to the Republic of China, but the coproduction of F-5E fighters will be prolonged. However, 8 months have now passed, but no action has been taken on extending the coproduction of F-5E military aircraft with the Republic of China. This shows that what President Reagan called "essence" for us is a phrase, not action.

Why is it so? Of course, the reason is that the U.S. Government hopes to hold back the Chinese Communists so that they will not oppose, by action, the U.S. arms sales to Taiwan. Knowing that the United States has some worries about this matter and wants to accommodate them, the Chinese Communists put up a performance to try to scare the United States by an empty threat and are employing dilatory tactics to stall the matter until President Reagan's term expires. Although the next U.S. president may not necessarily accommodate the Chinese Communists, "delaying" is detrimental to our country. We do not believe that President Reagan will be taken in by the Chinese Communists, but his intention to support the Republic of China with actual deeds is still verbal, without action.

We hope that President Reagan and Secretary of State Shultz will make the firm resolution to conduct Sino-U.S. relations and the relations between the U.S. and the bandit regime separately and not intermingle them. One of the strongest and most important points of the five-point statement on U.S. China policy announced by Reagan during his presidential campaign is that U.S. foreign policy will not be subject to interference by any foreign government. Nevertheless, the Reagan administration's policy toward the Republic of China has been subject to the Chinese Communists' interference from the beginning. The Chinese Communists have been blackmailing the United States by this means, and it is falling deeper into their trap. This is extremely regrettable. The United States does not deserve this because it is the most powerful country in the world. It is very sad that it is being fooled and blackmailed by the Chinese Communists.

We hope that President Reagan will make the firm resolution to realize U.S. arms sales to the Republic of China, adopt a resolute and stern attitude toward the Chinese Communists, sternly reject their blackmail and give the Republic of China real and essential support, but not just verbal support.

CHUNG YANG JIH PAO VIEWS NATIONAL CPC CONGRESS

[Text] According to a report transmitted by the Chinese Communists' NEW CHINA NEWS AGENCY, the '7th plenary session of the 11th Central Committee" of the bandits' party opened in Peiping on 6 August, and its "12th national congress" is scheduled to be convened on 1 September.

The so-called "12th national congress" was scheduled in early 1980, to be held by the end of that year, but failed to open as scheduled. In May this year, this congress reportedly was to be held in August, but now it is postponed again to September. The fact that this congress has been postponed time and again shows that the Chinese Communists are anxious to convene the congress, but have too many difficulties to surmount in this regard.

The Chinese Communists are trying in every possible way to give people an impression that the "12th national congress" will appear to affirm Teng Hsiao-ping's policies. To put it bluntly, this congress will actually be nothing but the froth of the Chinese Communist power struggle. The faction in power is trying to expand its influence. The situation in the power struggle shows that old problems defy resolution, while new ones have become increasingly serious. Thus, it is not so easy for members of Teng Hsiao-ping's faction to stabilize their position.

According to an AP dispatch from Peiping on 1 August, "this congress will formally repudiate the past ultraleftist policy, consolidate Teng Hsiao-ping's power and set up a number of people of the younger generation as leaders." "Teng Hsiao-ping hopes to make personnel, policies and organizations permanent so that it will be difficult to change anything once he leaves the political scene." This is something with which the Chinese Communists are trying to mislead people, something they want American journalists to spread for them. This is intended to make people believe that Teng Hsiao-ping now seems to be in favorable circumstances and that the Chinese Communist Party will be different from what it was in the past once Teng Hsiao-ping's policies are affirmed. One would err in overlooking the nature of the Chinese Communist Party should one hold such a view.

As we can see, there is no such thing as "Teng Hsiao-ping's policies." What Teng Hsiao-ping has been resorting to is still the Chinese Communist Party's cunning and varied traditional tactics, and his policies are still Mao Tse-tung's. This is clearly borne out by the Chinese Communist Party's "upholding the four fundamental principles."

Instituting "the production responsibility system," permitting "peddlers to operate," developing relations with foreign countries and luring foreigners to invest on the Chinese mainland -- such practices seem to make Teng Hsiao-ping different. However, all this is but a variation of united front tactics with which the Chinese Communists attempt to get some room to maneuver while at the end of their rope. By so doing, they may achieve some results but have to face many side effects too. First of all, such practices have made their cadres so confused that they can hardly tell the left from the right. The local situations are very chaotic, and people are seizing their opportunity to seek some personal gain. Reaping whatever profit they can reap and not being sure what will happen tomorrow, the people keep a wary eye on the Communist Party and have no confidence in it. This is how the "trust, belief and confidence crisis" has occurred. Emerging with this crisis is a trend of liberal thinking, which has thrown the Teng Hsiao-ping faction into confusion.

As far as the internal power struggle is concerned, this situation is unfavorable to the Teng Hsiao-ping faction. This is why this faction has been gradually returning onto the Chinese Communist Party's beaten track. The above-mentioned AP dispatch said that the Teng Hsiao-ping faction "has launched a political propaganda campaign and put forward a harder political line" in order to "create favorable conditions" for "the 12th national congress." Wren, New York TIMES resident correspondent in Peiping, reported: "As the Chinese Communist Party is about to hold a national congress, its leadership is trying hard to return the communist regime to its old traditions" in order to avoid the criticism of "importing bourgeois corruption." The measures it has taken in this regard include: "not allowing people to have contacts with foreigners, repeatedly warning against bourgeois influence, ordering literary and art workers and writers to take orders from the party and beginning to lay particular emphasis on heavy industry." In addition, "people with Western friends have been summoned by public security bureaus for questioning, and some students have just returned from the West have had to attend an orientation course lasting as long as 8 weeks."

The Communist Party's totalitarianism and despotism remain essentially the same despite all its apparent changes. No matter which faction is in power, it practices the same totalitarianism and despotism.

The Chinese Communists' JENMIN JIHPAO said in its 3 August editorial: Because of internal factors and external influence, "class struggle will exist in a certain scope for a long time to come and may be intensifying under given conditions. In addition to serious criminal elements in the economic field, in society there are a very small number of counterrevolutionaries opposing the socialist system as well as special agents or spies. Superstitious sects and secret societies have revived in some localities and are making use of superstitions to engage in counterrevolutionary and swindling activities. External reactionary forces are redoubling their efforts to carry out infiltration and sabotage activities against us. The whole party must be mentally prepared for a protracted struggle against hostile elements of various kinds in the political, economic cultural, social and other fields." The JENMIN JIHPAO editorial admitted: "There are still many unstable factors in public order in urban areas, and a number of new problems have also cropped up in public order in rural areas." It is therefore necessary to "generally institute the public security responsibility system and the personal responsibility system in public security" and "strengthen public security stations in urban areas and set up such stations in rural areas," and "all factories, mines, government organizations, schools and stores should strengthen and improve their security organizations and do security work well." This means that the faction in power wants to build a network of its own secret service. It forebodes that a "new cold wave" will hit the mainland.

We hold that in convening its "12th national congress," the Chinese Communist Party aims only to prolong its despotic rule and expand the influence of the faction in power and has no intention whatever of working for the well-being of the people. Teng Hsiao-ping's days are numbered, and Hu Yao-pang, Chao Tzu-yang and company are immature and are still not strong enough. As far as their power struggle is concerned, it changes only in form but not in essence. Since the Teng Hsiao-ping faction has not yet clearly gained the upper hand in the power struggle, it still has many dangers ahead.

NATIONAL POLICY, FREE SPEECH ISSUES DISCUSSED

OW100341 Taipei PA SHIH NIEN TAI in Chinese Jul 82 p 40

[Article by Ai Sheng: "What Is Our Basic National Policy? Where Is Freedom of Speech?"]

[Excerpts] Editor's note: Our basic national policy is "anticommunism." However, the way "anticommunism" is practiced may change with the changing times and situation. Therefore, unless it is stipulated by the constitution and the law that "we shall never talk peace," everyone has the right to suggest to the government whether we should talk peace. This is freedom of speech permitted by law. Only pronouncements by the president or the premier passed by the Legislative Yuan to have clear legal force can prohibit this kind of expression.

For this reason, this publication objects to the year's suspension of HAI CHAO and KUO SHIH PING LUN by the Government Information Office on the grounds that they "respond to the communist bandits peace talk and united front offensive, seriously violating our basic national policy and adversely affecting popular feeling and morale." It must be stated, however, that this publication has no intention of making any comment on the articles published in HAI CHAO and KUO SHIH PING LUN. [end editor's note]

On 6 July the TZU LIN WAN PAO carried on its front page a "notice to subscribers and readers at home and abroad" by KUO SHIN PING LUN fortnightly on its being suspended for a year and, on its second page, an item on the basis and reasons for this punishment.

The legal basis of the Government Information Office's decision are stipulations in article 40, clause 1, items 1 and 2 and clause 2 of the Publications Law, which provide for punishment of up to 1 year suspension.

As to the facts and justification cited by the Government Information Office, notification reads: "The articles 'Expectation and Helplessness,' 'Reunify China by Peaceful Means; Confront Talk With Talk' and so forth published in issue No 12 (dated 30 June 1982) of your publication have responded to the communist bandits' peace talk and united front offensive, seriously violated our basic national policy and adversely affected public spirit and morale, which is not in keeping with your registered purpose of 'expounding and propagating the basic national policy and inspiring public spirit and morale.'"

In the past 30 years or so, 8 or 9 of every 10 publications suspended in our country have been punished on the grounds that they "violated the basic national policy" and were "not in keeping with their registered purpose of publication." The case of the KUO SHIH PING LUN is not the first or only case, as there have been hundreds of cases before it.

On the suspension of KUO SHIH PING LUN, we must first clarify: What is meant by "responding" to the communist bandits' peace talk and united front offensive? What is meant by seriously violating the "basic national policy?" What is the communist bandits' "peace talk and united front" offensive? What is our "basic national policy?" Today the government has no explanation for all these questions. So the so-called "basic national policy" has no objective standard, but rather depends on the subjective decision the authorities choose to make at the time. How, then, can the publications hope to figure out the authorities' different state of mind from day to day? How can they know what course to follow? Therefore, to solve the problem, the government at least should establish a set of objective standards in this area so that the people will know what to follow.

Regarding the Government Information Office's charge of "responding to the communist bandits' peace talk and united front offensive," the phrase obviously means responding to the communist bandits' attempt to achieve their united front goals by means of peace talks. Therefore, a response has nothing to do with peace talks, which is a means, but has everything to do with the united front goals. In other words, the question is whether one responds to, or supports, the communist bandits' nine-point peace talk proposal. The Government Information Office charged the KUO SHIH PING LUN with "responding" based merely on the superficial observation that it also advocated peace talks without carefully examining the content and conditions of the peace talks it advocated, which are totally opposed to what the communist bandits stand for, and without considering the fact that the publication has repeatedly analyzed the advantages and disadvantages, gains and losses, before suggesting "agreeing to hold peace talks" to counter the communist bandits' "peace talk and united front" offensive. The Government Information Office ignored all these facts in black and white and preposterously charged the publication with "responding to the communist bandits' peace talk and united front" offensive. This is a completely false accusation, confounding black and white and confusing right and wrong.

Perhaps the Government Information Office would say: Indeed the content and conditions of the peace talks advocated by KUO SHIH PING LUN are different from those of the communist bandits, and it is a fact that its motive and objective are to check the communist bandits' peace talk and united front offensive.

However, the publication's advocacy of peace talks is, in itself, echoing the communist bandits' "peace talk and united front" offensive and "seriously violating our basic national policy." In our view, this apparently is the meaning behind the Government Information Office's action. If this is really what it meant, the idea is very worrisome, because it clearly says: "Base our national policy on the communist bandits' stands." That is, "if the communist bandits call for peace talks, our national policy should be to reject peace talks; anyone who advocates peace talks is responding to the communist bandits' peace talk and united front offensive and violating our basic national policy." By the same token, what the communist bandits have said or done, we must not say or do. Therefore, because the communist bandits speak Chinese, we must not speak Chinese; because the Communist bandits advocate the four modernizations on the mainland, we should work for four retrogressions here; for otherwise we are "responding to the communist bandits' peace talk and united front offensive and seriously violating our basic national policy." Isn't this kind of viewpoint and standard too unreasonable? It is also too dangerous and frightening.

In a general sense, as well as by political science definition, a so-called national policy refers to a policy of the country explicitly pronounced by "organs which give expression to the national purpose." Government policies, without approval and announcement by these organs, are not national policies. They are merely policies of the administrative departments and not legally binding on the people.

Capable of announcing national policies and expressing the national purpose is, first, the Constitution enacted by the constitution-making body, but there is no stipulation rejecting peace talks in Chapter 13, "Basic National Policies," of the Constitution. Another body authorized by the Constitution to express the national purpose is the legislative organ making the laws. In our country today, there are anticommunist laws, but no law rejecting peace talks. Therefore, our present national policy is "anticommunist" and not "for or against peace talks." The two are definitely different.

Should we talk peace? How to talk peace? These are questions concerning the means and tactics of "anticommunism" and are not the "anticommunist national policy" itself. The Government Information Office's action obviously mistook the means and tactics for carrying out the "anticommunist national policy" for the national policy.

Moreover, in his speech at the Sino-U.S. meeting to study "questions on mainland China," Premier Sun Yun-hsuan said, in clear-cut terms: "The question of what course China should follow should be left for all the Chinese people to solve." "China's reunification is a serious subject. We hope that the Chinese people on both sides of the Taiwan Strait will think carefully: What system after all can bring dignity, freedom and happiness to China?" "We hold that China's reunification should be based on the free will of all the Chinese people." These resolute and decisive words before the international academic meeting were still ringing in our ears when, on 3 July, before 30 days had passed, LUO SHIH PING LUN, expressing its "carefully thought out" view as an element of "all the Chinese people," representing a part of the "base of the free will of all the Chinese people," was accused by the Government Information Office, which is under Premier Sun's jurisdiction, of "responding to the communist bandits' peace talk and united front offensive and seriously violating our basic national policy." This is indeed incredible and alarming. We wonder if the Government Information Office has considered that its action will put Premier Sun in the unrighteous position of "breaking his promise to the people" and be tantamount to charging Premier Sun's above-mentioned remarks with "violating the national policy." Would this not make one wonder where and what our national policy is, and who makes and maintains it?

We do not think that the opinion of KUO SHIH PING LUN is the whole truth, nor do we think that its opinions are beyond criticism. We affirm that the government has the right not to accept its opinion. However, we think that the government must respect the right of KUO SHIH PING LUN to express its opinions, and that the government has no right to prevent it from "expressing" its opinions. If the people do not even have the right to offer opinions on what means and tactics to adopt against communism, we really dread to imagine: What kind of a democratic and free society this is?

Therefore, we feel that what has happened cannot be undone, but things can be done differently in the future. The Government Information Office should openly and carefully explain to the people about its action against KUO SHIH PING LUN, explaining how an opinion on whether the national policy should be carried out by means of peace talks was regarded as a violation of national policy. What is the legal basis of the Government Information Office's action? Only by so doing can the Government Information Office convince and win the trust of the people.

PRECISION AIR DEFENSE SYSTEM BOUGHT FROM EUROPE

[Text] Sources in the departments concerned disclosed the other day that our air force defense artillery units have been reequipped with a new air defense system bought from a European firm. This is the second precision weapon system bought from Europe after our navy cannons were replaced with a new type of cannons.

According to Jane's records, this air defense system has the highest precision of any regional air defense firepower control center with full-automatic search-and-track radar, a set of four-barrel missiles and two sets of double-barrel guns. Its air defense missiles, controlled by the firepower control center, can destroy enemy planes up to 12 kilometers away and beyond, while nearer, low-flying enemy planes can be locked in on by radar and destroyed by rapid fire. With induction warheads, the missiles and cannons can destroy enemy planes even without a direct hit.

A military expert said that the Nike Hercules and Hawk missiles in active service in our army are for use against enemy planes at medium and high altitudes. The new air defense system provides a comprehensive air defense system.

A great number of countries have adopted this air defense system. To operate this high-precision system, units concerned are actively conducting training in the army, and the antiaircraft artillery school will increase its enrollment to train skilled hands.

HSIN WAN PAO VIEWS 'TWO FACES' OF JAPAN

["New Talk" column: "The Two Faces of Japan, Enemy and Friend"]

[Text] In order to deal with the incident of Japan's distortion of the history of its aggression aginst China, the Japanese Government has sent Hiroshi Hashimoto, the Foreign Ministry's director general of its Public Information and Cultural Affairs Bureau, and Mr Hitoshi Osaki, the Education Ministry's director general of its Science and International Affairs Bureau, to visit China. According to the Japanese JIJI PRESS when the two officials arrived at Beijing by air yesterday evening, no officials of any departments concerned in the Chinese Government came to the airport to receive the two Japanese officials. This showed how stern an attitude the Chinese side has adopted.

The Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs has approached the Japanese side twice demanding that the Japanese side correct the Japanese Education Ministry's error in revising and examining the textbooks. The first time the Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs sent Xiao Xiangqian, director of the First Asian Affairs Department, to interview the Japanese envoy to China, Koji Watanabe. Later, as the Japanese Education Ministry denied the issue by resorting to sophistry and shifted its responsibility, China tried a second time, sending a higher-ranking official, Deputy Minister of Foreign Affairs, Wu Xieqian, to interview Yasue Katori, Japanese ambassador to China. Then China rejected the Japanese education minister's visit to China.

Now, the Japanese side has not only failed to correct its errors, but has sent two officials at the level of bureau directors to visit China. What these two officials will receive is only a personal experience of the Chinese people's hatred for the Japanese militarism.

The solution to the Japanese textbook issue lies in the Japanese Education Ministry adopting measures to correct the distorted narration about the history of Japan's aggression against China. In regard to whether it was an aggression or an "advance," there is a clear demarcation line between the rights and wrongs, and there is no room for compromise. Therefore, no ambiguous attitude toward this issue is allowed. The issue of whether or not the Japanese side admits that the Japanese militarists have aggressed against China is a major issue of principle related to the development of Sino-Japanese relations, and the Japanese side must give a clear answer to this issue.

During the past few years, many Japanese described their country as hesitating at the crossroads and at facing the obligation to make a choice for making progress. The broad masses of the Japanese people have suffered the misery of war and feel a deep remorse for previous aggression abroad. They deeply hope to peacefully coexist forever with the Chinese and other Asian people. However, at the same time, a small number of militarists want to stage a comeback and are creating disturbances. These two trends are locked in battle and neither side has been able to rout the other. As a result, Japan is still hesitating in choosing its future prospects.

At present two quite contradictory films are being shown in Japan. These two films represent the two parties in the conflicts. One of the films is the "Great Empire of Japan," which acclaims the militarists' aggression and beautifies war criminal Tojo Hideki; and the other is "An Unfinished Chess Game," which was made through the cooperation of China and Japan and which reflects Japan's guilt in aggressing China and sings the praises of the Chinese and Japanese peoples' desire for friendship. The simultaneous showing of the two films jointly gives people and overall picture of Japan's political situation today.

What will the Japanese Government choose between the two conflicting trends? If it wants peaceful development, it must support the just trend and fight against the unhealthy trend and it must deal heavy blows to the militarists and never allow them to order people about.

If the Japanese Government pretends politeness and compliance and resorts to hemming and hawing and double-dealing in order to vainly attempt to gain advantage from both sides, and if it tries to beautify aggressive activities and absolve the aggressors of their guilt, it will make the militarists more arrogant. This will only result in harming the Japanese people as well as the Japanese Government.

The Asian countries clearly see the two trends in Japan and they must firmly fight the adverse trend of the revival of Japanese militarism while promoting their friendship with the Japanese people. Developing friendly cooperation and fighting against aggressive wars supplement one another. In order to develop the so-called "substantive diplomatic relations" with Japan, the Taiwan authorities have had no scruples in cooperating with Japan in making the film, the "Great Empire of Japan," and have thus disregarded cardinal national principles. This will surely win them the contempt of their Chinese compatriots.

EXPLANATION ASKED FOR TAIWAN AID IN JAPAN FILM

[Text] "15 August" Approaching

The type of activities marking 15 August this year in Japan's official quarters will be worth noting.

For Japan, that day is an end-of-the-war commemoration day" marking the end of World War II. For 37 years, the Japanese side has all along shown an unwillingness to refer to this as the day the Japanese emperor announced Japan's surrender. Instead, it has referred to the day in "end of the war" terms.

The showing of the film "The Great Japanese Empire" has been shown to coincide with that day. Moreover, the film is being shown by 240 motion picture houses in the whole country at the same time. The aim is to add to its attraction and its influence on young people.

Before the solution of the matter about Japan's distorting history and revising textbooks, will the leading officials of the Japanese Government still go to the pacify-the-nation Shinto shrine to offer sacrefices on that day? We may as well wait and see.

Strange Arguments in Taiwan

Yesterday, Taiwan's "China News" came out with a strange argument that Japan should explain its revision of history and textbooks to the Kuomintang of China rather than to the Communist Party of China.

As an ancient saying in China goes, "brothers may fight at home but must present a united front against outsiders." Some people in Taiwan have forgotten this statement.

Before the outbreak of the anti-Japanese war, the Kuomintang authorities kept clamoring for "becoming united at home against the foreigners" in order not to spoil the whole situation. We cannot understand why they have so far failed to draw a lesson from this.

We may as well point out two things here for their attention.

First, when the revision of the textbooks was discovered, Beijing first lodged a protest and then rejected the visit to China by the Japanese minister of education. For certain reasons, the Taiwan authorities all along remained quiet. Later, as public opinion in Taipei raised questions, the Taiwan authorities could not help taking a stand on this matter.

Help in Shooting the Film Mentioned in Japan's Advertisements

Second, the advertisements in the Japanese press for the film "The Great Japanese Empire," building up Tojo and advocating the war of aggression, have explicitly mentioned that the China Air Lines of Taiwan and the Central Film Company helped in shooting this film.

These two companies are organs under the Taiwan authorities. They even helped the Japanese film company in shooting a film that distorts history. This is obviously an act of rebellion against the whole Chinese people on both sides of the Taiwan Strait.

The Taiwan compatriots who were under the yoke of Japanese militarism for as long as 50 years will never let this matter drop.

The Taiwan authorities have paid lipservice to the "three people's principles in unifying China." But in this matter where is the nationalism embodied in the three people's principles?

The Taiwan Authorities Should Issue an Explanation

The Japanese Ministry of Education naturally has to explain the revision of textbooks. Things should be made clear to the 1 billion people of China. Included are not only the compatriots on the mainland but also our compatriots in Taiwan. Hong Kong and Macao compatriots and all overseas Chinese abroad should also be included.

The Taiwan authorities first refrained from taking a stand on Japan's revision of the textbooks and then instigated the press to put forth the absurd idea that the Japanese side should explain things to the Kuomintang rather than to the Communist Party. How ugly are these two attitudes on their part?

Moreover, the Taiwan authorities should especially issue an explanation to all the people of China: Why did they send the China Air Lines and the Central Film Company to help in the shooting of this film?

MING PAO: DENG, CHEN URGE ILLITERACY ELIMINATION

HK020400 Hong Kong MING PAO in Chinese 31 Jul 82 p 5

[Special dispatch from Beijing: "Deng, Chen Comment on Eliminating Illiteracy"]

[Text] In the process of carrying out its modernization program, the CPC is faced with the issue of opening up intelligence resources and training personnel. Recently, Vice Premier Wan Li gave a speech stating that now everything is ready for the carrying out of the modernization program and the only thing lacking is personnel. Judging from a long-term point of view, in order to train personnel, efforts should be made in giving basic education in kindergartens and primary schools and the policy of popularizing primary school education must be adhered to.

This reporter has learned that on 10 January this year, Hu Qiaomu, secretary of the CPC central Secretariat wrote a letter to Deng Xiaoping and Chen Yun, requesting that they pass on the letter to Hu Yaobang and Zhao Ziyang.

In this letter, Hu Qiaomu put forward two suggestions: first, on how to solve the problem of the development of state power at the basic level in the rural areas throughout the country; and second, on how to popularize education in the rural areas.

With regard to the problem of how the CPC can popularize education in the rural areas, Hu Qiaomu said in his letter, "We must persist in carrying out compulsory education in our rural areas. Socialism, the cooperative system and spiritual civilization must be built on the basis of a certain degree of education. This is a fundamental thesis of Marxism-Leninism. We will never be able to realize the four modernizations while our country is full of foolish, backward and illiterate people or while the number of these people is increasing. Indeed, economically, China is backward today, but it is not in any way more backward than Japan during the period of the Meiji revolution. Why can we, the CPC, not achieve after more than 30 years in power, what a Japanese emperor could achieve over a century ago? Indeed, during the time from the initial period of liberation to the beginning of the 1970's, we did not actually achieve the popularization of education; however, we adhered to this policy and achieved great progress over the pre-liberation" period.

Moreover, in his letter, Hu Qiaomu said, "The actual realization of the popularization of education in such a large country as China must certainly take a substantial length of time and be carried out step by step. In some especially backward areas, it may take even more time and require special measures. However, we must first unconditionally and unswervingly make up our minds and be clear of our goal and principle. Only under this prerequisite can we make steady progress. Otherwise, there will be confusion in our minds which will make it difficult for us to progress in the future."

Deng Xiaoping and Chen Yun wrote their comments on the letter the very next day, expressing their consent with Hu Qiaomu's opinions and requesting the CPC Central Secretariat and the State Council to formulate measures for carrying out the popularization of education.

In May this year, Hu Yaobang commented on two reports. One of the reports was on the low educational level of primary school teachers in minority nationality areas, urgently demanding that their educational level be raised. On this report, he wrote the following comment: "This report has grasped a basic problem for the large number of primary schools in our rural areas (not just those in the minority nationality areas). If we do not solve this problem, the popularization and improvement of primary school education will only be empty talk." On another report, Hu Yaobang wrote the following comment: "With regard to primary school education, there are indeed many problems to study and these problems may differ in different areas as conditions vary. Please draft a document on the basis of the study that you will make, and send the document to the Central Secretariat for discussion and issuance."

Regarding Zhongnanhai's resolution, the new education minister, He Dongchang, said, "The leading party group of the Education Ministry has decided to hold a meeting on the readjustment and reform of general education during the summer vacation this year. The meeting is aimed mainly at discussing the solution of new problems that have cropped up in the process of further popularizing primary school education, realizing the structural reform of middle school education and developing the part-work and part-study system." He stressed that general education is the basis for higher education and if the quality of primary and middle school education is not raised, it will be difficult to raise the quality of higher education.

He Dongchang especially stressed that the most serious problem at present is the impact of the ultraleftist ideology and the shortsightedness of small producers that has taken shape for a long time and that has looked down on education, knowledge, science and intellectuals. He stressed that this ideology and shortsightedness was still exerting an impact that cannot be neglected.

RENMIN RIBAO ON U.S., SOVIET MILITARY SATELLITES

[Article by Yang Xiumin [2799 4423 2404]: "The Development of U.S. and Soviet Military Satellites"]

[Text] Since the first artificial satellite was launched in 1957, the two superpowers, the United States and the Soviet Union, proceeding from the requirements of their global strategy, have competed with each other in developing military satellites, thus engaging in a fierce arms race in outer space. Over 70 percent of the satellites they have launched are for military purposes.

At present the military space systems of the United States and the Soviet Union include photographic and electronic reconnaisance, missile early warning, ocean monitoring, communications, navigational guidance, weather and ground survey satellites. All these satellites are now in use and are also being continually improved and perfected. For example, the U.S. missile early warning system can determine within 6 minutes of a missile launch whether it is offensive and what its target is in the United States, thus providing an early warning. The Soviet photographic reconnaisance satellites can take very high resolution photographs. There is more than one such satellite at work at all times, and they can cover the whole globe for most of the year. The two superpowers are also developing antisatellite systems that can destroy enemy satellites. The Soviet Union is 10 years ahead of the United States in this field, and has already tested working interceptor satellites and laser and particle concentration weapons.

Apart from their possession of corresponding military systems, there are differences between the United States and Soviet Union in the development of military space technology. The Soviet Union is very active in its space activities. In the past 10 and more years Soviet satellite launchings have been 2.5 times more numerous than those of the United States. In addition, the Soviet Union has attached extremely great importance to the development of manned flight technology. It is also developing large transport vehicles with a payload six to seven times greater than that of U.S. spaceships, with the aim of putting large, permanent and manned space stations into orbit. Their crews will be able to select their targets in space and command and control defensive and offensive space weapons.

The space shuttle on which the United States has exerted great efforts in recent years has military potentials that cannot be overlooked. It is a new type of multipurpose vehicle, cheaper and more reliable than a one-shot carrier rocket. It can launch all kinds of military satellites, repair and recover U.S. satellites in orbit, capture or destroy enemy satellites, be formed into a large space structure, act as a launching platform for laser and other military weapons, carry out manned reconnaisance and so on. When necessary it can also act as a military command center. The repeated successful test flights on this spacecraft have enabled the United States to gain more results from less launchings compared with the Soviet Union and to continue to maintain its superiority in manned flight technology. Putting this spaceship to use is bound to speed up the militarization of space and make the space rivalry between the United States and the Soviet Union ever fiercer.

Both superpowers have spent huge sums on and paid tremendous prices in developing their military satellite systems. During fiscal year 1981, the space budget of NASA was about $4.997 billion while that of the U.S. Defense Department was about $4.789 billion. In fiscal year 1982 these figures have been respectively $5.617 billion and $5.916 billion. It is said that the Soviet Union's annual space budget exceeds that of the United States.

Right from the start, military satellites have been used by the Soviet Union and the United States to serve their strategic and tactical aim of gaining world hegemony.

For instance, at the beginning of the 1960's, U.S. reconnaissance satellites confirmed the number of missiles deployed by the Soviet Union and exploded the myth of the missile gap. During the fourth Middle East war in 1973, U.S. photographic reconnaissance satellites discovered the holes in the weak Egyptian defenses in the Great Bitter Lake area, and the Israelis organized an attack by stealth in accordance with this intelligence and were able to recover to seize the initiative.

Due to the daily perfection of space technology, a full range of military satellites of all types are monitoring the globe day and night, providing large quantities of strategic and tactical intelligence for the two superpowers. U.S. military communications satellites undertake 80 percent of the country's entire military communications tasks. Space technology is the acme of modern science and technology and a hallmark of a country's scientific and technological development and economic strength. It can both serve man and also become a tool of war that can bring great calamity on man. Apart from antisatellite systems for intercepting and destroying enemy satellites, military satellites can be used for civil purposes in peacetime, such as commerical communications, survery of resources, weather forecasting and so on.

How to make space technology, the common wealth of man, serve world peace and human progress, and how to take effective measures to stop the two superpowers from regarding the militarization of space as an important means of gaining world hegemony -- this is a problem of common concern to the peoples of the world, and is also the purpose of the second UN meeting in Vienna on the exploration and peaceful uses of outer space.

UN CONFERENCE URGES SPACE DEMILITARIZATION

[Text] Vienna, August 14 (XINHUA) -- The second conference of the exploration and peaceful use of outer space ended its 5-day general debate here Friday with most speakers urging an end to the militarization in outer space. During the debate, representatives of about 90 countries, regions or international organizations expounded their positions for the peaceful use of space technology and against the militarization of space activities. Many countries called for increased international cooperation and assistance to the developing countries in the fields of space science and technology.

Second World countries expressed their concern that arms race could be brought to the outer space. The development of anti-satellite weapon systems were especially opposed. One of the two superpowers only paid lip service to the theme of demilitarization of space activities. The other even avoided to mention demilitarization.

At the end of the general debate, a declaration by the "Group of 77" developing countries was presented to the conference, which demands a ban on the testing, stationing and deployment of any weapons in space. All countries, especially those that have the ability to do so should be asked to refrain from any activities which could lead to the extension of the arms race into outer space, the declaration said.

U.S. RECESSION CONTINUES FOR FULL YEAR

CW151734 Beijing XINHUA in English 1559 GMT 15 Aug 82

[Text] Beijing, August 14 (XINHUA) -- The eight economic recession that hit the United States in the post-war period has continued a full year by last month as industrial production in the country fell by 0.1 percent last month as compared with a month earlier, according to figures released by the Federal Reserve Board.

The industrial production index of last month fell to 138.1 points from 153.9 points in the same month of last year (taking the figure of 1967 as 100), showing a drop of 11.4 percent; the operating rate of factories dived from 79.8 percent to 69.5 percent in the same period, a drop of 13.9 percent; the unemployment rate rose from seven percent to 9.8 percent, or from 7.5 million to 10.79 million, an increase of 43.9 percent. Since the start of this year, business failures averaged more than 450 cases each week, a jump of 43 percent over last year.

Where is the economy headed in the foreseeable future? There have been different forecasts in the country: The official view is "the recession has reached its lowest point" and the rise in private spending will stimulate the economy to rebound at a faster pace. Some economists admitted that there have been signs of a pickup, but they pointed out that they will be "the weakest recovery in the post-World War II period." But most economists are of the view that the economy is in a twilight zone -- "it's either going to be morning or night." They pointed out that the steep slide experienced last week at the stock market is a reflection of "that elusive U.S. recovery."

The American press generally deem that the "bugaboo" of interest rates holds the key to the economic trends in the country. The Federal Reserve Board has been easing its monetary policy slightly since mid-July, lowering the discount rate from 12.5 percent to the current 10.5 percent. The prime lending rate charged by U.S. commercial banks to their best corporate customers also showed a relative drop from 16.5 percent to 14.5 percent. However, "the decline in interest rates is limited both in time and in depth," said an entrepreneur.

The unprecedented gross financial deficits troubling the U.S. Government is the main roadblock to the continual decline in interest rates. The budget deficits in the current fiscal year ending September 30 is estimated at 108.9 billion U.S. dollars, nearly twice as high as the figure for the previous fiscal year. The Congress put the deficits for the next fiscal year at 146 billion dollars. To finance the red ink, the Treasury Department has announced that it will borrow 50.5 billion dollars on the public credit markets in the third quarter of this year, and another 50 billion dollars in the fourth quarter. Such gross borrowings will drain 56 percent of money available on the credit markets, thus making it difficult for the interest rates of short-term credits to fall considerably. Meanwhile, the big financial deficits augur ill for inflation, thus making it difficult for the interest rates of long-term credits to come down. Not a few economists fear that if there will be a pick-up, then borrowing by business and private sources will mount, thus causing a rapid rebound of interests rates on the credit markets. All this combines to threaten a new recession after a short-time recovery.

With the economic prospects shrouded in uncertainty, even President Ronald Reagan has toned down his hitherto-optimistic predictions. He conceded in a recent public speech that a return to economic prosperity will be a lengthy process requiring "enormous effort and patience."

[Article by Wei Yuqin [7614 3768 3830]: "Distorting the History Written in Blood Will Not Be Tolerated"]

[Text] The Japanese Education Ministry has distorted the history of Japanese aggression in the course of screening secondary and primary school textbooks in a bid to guide young Japanese onto the wrong road of militarism. However, can certain people in the Japanese Education Ministry succeed in distorting the history written in blood?

It is beneficial to both the Chinese and Japanese peoples, on the 37th anniversary of Japan's unconditional surrender, to recall the history of Japan's aggression against China and the Asia-Pacific region and its disastrous defeat.

Japan launched a war of aggression against China in 1894 and forced the Qing government to sign the Shimonoseki treaty, under which Japan forcibly occupied Taiwan, its offshore islands and the Penghu Islands, all belonging to China. Japan grabbed many colonial privileges in northeast China after the end of the Japanese-Russian War in 1905. Japan annexed Korea in 1910. During World War I, Japan seized German colonial interests in China and the Pacific islands occupied by Germany. A serious economic crisis broke out in the capitalist world in the fall of 1929, and this reached a peak in Japan in 1931. The Japanese Government attempted in vain to find a way out by means of aggression. Back in 1927 the Japanese Cabinet had decided on the guiding principle: "If we want to conquer China, we must first conquer Manchuria and Mongolia. If we want to conquer the world, we must first conquer China." Japan actively prepared for war after that. On 18 September 1931, Japanese forces bombed and destroyed a section of railroad at Liutiaogou near Shenyang, falsely accused the Chinese army of sabotaging the railroad, and proceeded to launch an attack. Due to the nonresistance policy of the Kuomintang government, the Japanese army rapidly occupied the whole of the northeast. This was the "18 September incident" that shook China and the world. Northeast China was then turned into a Japanese colony. Japan set up the puppet Manchukuo in the northeast in March 1932.

After the "18 September incident," Japan proceeded to create an incident in Shanghai on 28 January 1932, launching a large-scale attack. This was the notorious "28 January incident."

Not long after occupying the northeast, the Japanese army intruded into north China and pressed on Peiping and Tianjing. Due to the continued nonresistance policy of the Kuomintang government, Jehol and Chitung were taken under Japanese military control in 1933. In 1935 Japan basically seized political, economic and military control of north China.

On 7 July 1937 the Japanese aggressor army created the "Lugouqiao incident" under the pretext of the "disappearance" of a Japanese soldier during "maneuvers" near Lugouqiao, and then proceeded to launch a large-scale attack. The Japanese aggressor army attacked and occupied Peiping and Tianjin during July, launched a massive attack on Shanghai on 13 August, and entered Nanjing in mid-December, where they perpetrated the Nanjing massacre of peaceful civilians, an atrocity of unparalleled savagery. The Japanese army continued to press forward their attack after that. Shandong, Shanxi, Jiangsu, Anhui, Henan, Guangdong, Hubei, Zhejiang, Jiangxi, Hunan, Guangxi and Fujian Provinces came wholly or partially under the iron heel of the Japanese aggressors.

The Japanese aggressor army practiced a policy of "burn all, kill all, loot all." Everywhere they went they burned, killed and looted, stopped at nothing in doing evil, and committed towering crimes against the Chinese people.

While launching the war of aggression, Japanese imperialism actively prepared for further expansion into Southeast Asia and the Pacific region. A meeting of five ministers (the prime minister and the ministers of the treasury, the navy, the army, and foreign affairs) in August 1936 decided to take as their fundamental policy "aspiring for development towards the south seas" while "assuring" Japan's "position on the East Asia mainland." From September to October 1940, the Japanese Cabinet again decided to "take positive action" to bring the British, French, Netherlands and Portuguese colonies in Southeast Asia into the "new order in east Asia." They clung to their idea of setting up a vast colonial empire known as the "Greater East Asia Coprosperity Sphere," and decided to launch a "greater east Asia war."

Hitler's Germany invaded Poland in September 1939. Japan concentrated its forces on attacking China, so as to "create a favorable situation for a new order in east Asia (including the south)," and in addition signed a tripartite pact with fascist Germany and Italy in September 1940, thus forming the fascist axis of aggression, with each working in concert with the others. Germany attacked the Soviet Union in June 1941. The Japanese privy council passed a decision "not to shrink from war with Britain and America." On 8 December Japan launched a sneak attack on Pearl Harbor and sparked off the undeclared Pacific war. On 9 December Japan occupied southern Thailand and the capital Bangkok, and from Thailand invaded Malaya to the south and Burma to the north. The Japanese Army occupied Manila in January 1942 and the whole of the Philippines in May. The Japanese army occupied Singapore in February and Burma in May. They also occupied Malaya and Indonesia in the same year.

Japan behaved in an extremely arrogant fashion after invading Southeast Asia. In January 1942, Japan, Germany and Italy signed a military agreement carving up the world, by which the vast area from east of India to the American west coast was defined as Japan's "combat" theater. The war criminal Tojo clamored that "the key to the greater east Asia war lies on the one hand in assuring the strategic bases in east Asia and on the other in bringing the areas with important resources under our administration and control." In February the same year, in its decision on "how to make use of the imperial spheres of resources," Japan proposed that "Japan, Manchuria, China, and the southwest Pacific region" should be regarded as "spheres of resources," and "Australia, India and other places" as "spheres of supply," and also formulated a 15-year scheme for plundering resources.

But the beautiful dream was short-lived. Japanese imperialism's rabid aggression and savage plunder aroused the strong opposition of the peoples in the countries that were its victims. Under the leadership of the CPC, the Chinese people waged a peristent anti-Japanese guerrilla war, established a resist-Japan national united front and democratic bases, and dealt stunning blows to the Japanese aggressors. The peoples of Korea and the Southeast Asian countries which had been attacked and occupied by Japan also whipped up anti-Japanese guerrilla warfare. In the Pacific, the Japanese aggressor troops were wiped out at Saipan, Guam, Iwo Jima and elsewhere. Under the common stunning blows dealt by the Chinese people and the peoples of the antifascist allies, Japanese imperialism announced its unconditional surrender on 15 August 1945. The pipedream of Japanese militarism to dominate the Asia-Pacific region was completely smashed.

The Japanese imperialist war of aggression brought painful calamities to the peoples of the Asia-Pacific region and also on the Japanese people. The move of a handful of Japanese militarist elements in vainly attempting to erase this history, which is still fresh in people's memories, will absolutely not be tolerated.

Chongqing Bombing Recalled

[Summary] On the eve of the 37th anniversary of the victory in the war of resistance against Japan, people of all circles in Chongqing in Sichuan Province exposed the brutal crimes of Japanese militarism by citing the fact that the Japanese troops who invaded China inhumanly bombed Chongqing. They denounced the Japanese Ministry of Education for altering the history of aggression against our country in revising textbooks.

(Yang Shoubai), national CPPCC committee member, chairman of the Congqing Municipal Federation of Industry and Commerce and former assistant manager of the (Jijincheng) bank, told reporters: "On 3 and 4 May 1939, Japanese troops who had invaded China inhumanly and viciously bombed Chongqing. I am an eyewitness and a victim," he said: "The large-scale Japanese bombing resulted in heavy losses in industry and commerce in Chongqing."

(Jin Ronghan), municipal CPPCC committee member, adviser of the advisory office of the municipal government and former director of the Third Department of the Chongqing Air Defense Headquarters of the Kuomintang, indignantly said: On 3 and 4 May, more than 20 Japanese planes each day dropped large numbers of bombs onto the busiest districts of Chongqing, reducing buildings to ashes. Innumerable people were killed and injured. These hard facts cannot be altered by Japanese militarism.

Zhou Qinhue, vice chairman of the provincial CPPCC committee and a public figure without party affiliation; and (Pei Chainggui), aged 86, vice chairman of central committee of the Kuomintang Revolutionary Committee and vice chairman of the municipal CPPCC committee, made similar accusations.

They said: "The Chinese and Japanese people must firmly remember the crimes of Japanese militarism in invading China and oppose the revival of Japanese militarism. The friendship between the Chinese and Japanese people must develop from generation to generation."

Henan Forum Raps Ministry

HK120230 Zhengzhou Henan Provincial Service in Mandarin 1100 GMT 10 Aug 82

[Text] The teaching and research section of the history of the CPC under the provincial party school and the office in charge of compiling local party history of the provincial CPC committee held a forum 7 August on the distortion of historical facts about Japanese aggression against China by the Japanese Ministry of Education in approving the revision of history textbooks and embellishing the aggression of Japanese militarism. The participants voiced their great indignation over the distortion of historical facts about the aggression against China and the unreasonable explanation provided by the Japanese Ministry of Education. They held: By ignoring the historical facts, changing aggression against China into "advancing" into China and describing the massacre of the Chinese people as due to the resistance of the Chinese army and people, the Japanese Ministry of Education intends to write off at one stroke the criminal Japanese aggression against China and create public opinion for reviving Japanese militarism. Having cited many facts, the participants condemned the savage acts of the Japanese aggressors carried out mopping up operations in the [words indistinct] area, raping, burning and killing along the way. In Chenzhuang alone, more than 1,900 houses were burned and more than 700 residents were killed. In April 1941, the Japanese aggressors carried out large mopping up operations in the base areas located in Shanxi, Shandong, Hesei and Henan and implemented the brutal policy of "burn all, kill all, loot all" in Neihuang and other counties.

On 12 April during the operations, more than 5,000 armymen and civilians were killed. The distortion of historical facts about Japanese aggression against China by the Japanese Ministry of Education is deceiving the Japanese younger generation and insulting the Chinese people. All participants expressed their resolute support for the just stand of the Chinese Foreign Ministry. They are convinced that the Japanese people and the persons with lofty ideals in the Japanese Government will wage a struggle against the Japanese Ministry of Education and the right wing forces of Japanese militarism. The friendship between the people of China and Japan is an irresistible historical trend.

Shanghai Scholars Blast Change

During the eight-year war of aggression against China, a total of 18 million Chinese people were killed by Japanese invaders. 53 cities were ruined, which brought losses of property to the Chinese people equal to 50 billion U.S. dollars. At the same [as received], he said, the war also caused disaster for the Japanese people. More than 2.3 million Japanese people died in the war.

The professor said: "The facts should be told to the younger generation of both countries so that they can draw lessons from the bitter history to unite in the struggle against a rising tendency that would damage the friendly relations between the two countries."

Wu Jie, professor of the history department at Fudan University, said that the incident of September 18 and the Nanjing massacre were deleted in the Japanese textbooks published in 1980. This year, the phrase "aggression against China" in the textbooks approved by the Japanese Education Ministry has been changed to "having advanced" into China. "This is a premeditated action, brazenly distorting history," he said.

Zhou Gucheng, Tan Qixiang and Han Shuzhi, also made speeches at today's meeting. They said that it was the duty of Chinese historians to expose the crimes committed by Japanese aggressors in China and oppose the distortion of history by the Japanese Education Ministry.

Japanese Press Reaction

[Text] Tokyo, August 14 (XINHUA) -- YOMIURI SHIMBUN and the TOKYO SHIMBUN today published editorials urging the Japanese Government to correct, in the spirit of the joint Japanese-Chinese statement, the mistakes of distorting history in school textbooks.

YOMIURI SHIMBUN said the problem as it now stands is not whether the Japanese Government should come up with any new policy. It is essential for the prime minister to reaffirm the mutual commitments made in the joint statement and to express Japan's willingness to correct accounts in the textbooks that run counter to the spirit of the statement, the paper said.

The longer the textbook issue remains unresolved, the more awkward will Japan's position become, the paper warned. TOKYO SHIMBUN, said one can never agree with the assertion that China's protest constitutes "interference in Japan's internal affairs."

SANKEI SHIMBUN, which has all along opposed to correcting mistakes in the textbooks [as received], today carried a report on the views expressed by Kihei Kijima, a member of the House of Representatives from the Socialist Party. Kijima said that the Japanese Education Ministry's distortion of history "runs counter to the spirit of the joint statement between Japan and China".

He said that all textbooks in the world describe Japan's war against China as "aggression". This is also the common view of scholars, he noted. Academically speaking, it is also correct to describe the acts of Japan, Germany and Italy during the Second World War as "aggression", he said.

KYODO: JAPAN, PRC DIFFER ON YEN CREDITS

[Text] Tokyo Aug 16 (KYODO) -- Japan and China will hold working-level talks on bilateral economic cooperation in Tokyo August 23-24, the Foreign Ministry announced Monday. The ministry said discussions will center on the amount of yen credits Japan is to provide in fiscal 1982 to help promote Chinese development projects.

China in June asked Japan to extend yen 91.2 billion (dollar 348 million) in yen credits in the fiscal year ending next March to help finance six projects, including the Baoshan steel mill project near Shanghai, ministry officials said. The Japanese Government says the amount is too big, and considers an appropriate level would be about yen 65 billion (dollar 248 million).

SRV REPORTEDLY INCREASING ARMS TO KAMPUCHEA

[Text] Bangkok, August 15 (XINHUA) -- The Soviet Union has stepped up shipments of tanks and new automatic rifles to Vietnamese troops in Kampuchea, the head of the Thai security said here Saturday. Prasong Soonsiri, secretary-general of the National Security Council of Thailand, said the arrival of the new Soviet arms only "indicates that Hanoi has no intention of pulling its troops out of Kampuchea." He said the Soviets moved new T-54 battle tanks and armoured personnel carriers into Kampuchea last month.

He described the new combat assault rifle as the AKM-47, which has a plastic stock and fires faster and more powerfully than the traditional AK-47. He said the fighting efficiency of the Vietnamese troops in Kampuchea has been eroding. "That is why they need new arms to shore up their battle efficiency," he added.

He pointed out that Thach lied in claiming that Vietnam might in the future invite the Soviet Union to set up military bases in his country. But the fact was well known that the Soviet Union already had such a base at Cam Ranh Bay, about 240 kilometres northeast of Ho Chi Minh City, he said.

Prasong accused Vietnam of sticking to a colonization policy in Kampuchea, and pointed out that Phnom Penh was a "colony" of Hanoi, where everything was under Vietnamese control. All senior "officials" in the Heng Samrin regime spoke Vietnamese while textbooks for school children were also in Vietnamese.

VODK SAYS SRV TROOPS DESERT IN KAMPUCHEA

[Text] Beijing, August 15 (XINHUA) -- About 150 Vietnamese troops in Kampuchea have deserted recently because they are unwilling to fight there, according to reports from radio Democratic Kampuchea. A group of about 100 Vietnamese soldiers escaped on July 23 from the garrison in Mondolkiri Province, eastern Kampuchea.

In three days from July 27, fifteen Vietnamese troops in Kompong Thom Province fled Staung County to Tuol Sala Village, Baray County. They told villagers that they were compulsorily recruited to serve as cannon fodder for the Le Duan clique.

On July 28, another 37 Vietnamese troops tried to escape in a group from the battlefields in western Siemreap Province but only 7 succeeded. The other 30 were taken back when they arrived in Chikreng County. They were tortured and cast into prison.

BEIJING ARTICLE REPORTS ON SRV OPIUM TRAFFIC

OW101148 Beijing in Vietnamese to Vietnam 1400 GMT 8 Aug 82

[Station correspondent's article: "Traffic in Opium, a Byproduct of Vietnam's Declining Economy"]

[Text] In recent years the Le Duan clique's propaganda machinery in border areas has claimed that Vietnam's economy has met with difficulties mainly because of the failure to grow poppies. To satisfy the so-called needs of foreign countries, the clique has urged the people in these areas to intensively cultivate this plant. Thus, with the Vietnamese rulers' encouragement, poppy cultivation and opium traffic have developed vigorously while many other trades in Vietnam have declined.

According to a report from Jinping County in Yunnan Province, China, since 1980 the Vietnamese rulers have dispatched a number of opium traffickers to Jinping. The amount of smuggled opium seized by this country's public security forces in 1980 and 1981 was larger than that seized from 1975 to 1979. On 19 March 1982, the public security seized a cache of opium that nearly equaled the total amount seized in 1975.

As revealed by many Vietnamese refugees, the Vietnamese Government lifted the ban on poppy cultivation last year in a number of villages and hamlets in Phong Tho District close to the Chinese border. Vietnamese rural cadres have zoned areas for poppy cultivation. The Vietnamese administration has ruled that a peasant family engaged in growing poppy must pay 1 kilo of opium as tax. In some areas, the per capita tax is 1 liang of opium. Even babies must pay this tax. Opium production is therefore legal in Vietnam and opium traffic has developed feverishly. At present, Vietnamese cadres in border areas are making money through opium smuggling. The higher their ranks, the more intensively their traffic in opium will be carried out through extremely cunning means.

It is not surprising that all Vietnamese refugees have admitted that opium has become a byproduct of Vietnam's declining economy. However, knowledgeable people are aware that more than a century ago the imperialist aggressors waged an opium war against China and were severely condemned for resorting to despicable maneuvers to export opium in order to poison the Chinese people and rob them of their wealth and money. But no one foresaw that more than a century later the Vietnamese rulers of the so-called Socialist Republic of Vietnam would repeat the maneuvers formerly carried out by the colonialists.

Along with their frenzied armed provocations against China, the Vietnamese rulers have used opium as a weapon to poison the Chinese people and have made huge profits by producing and trafficking in opium in order to extricate their country from its current serious economic crisis and to satisfy their aggressive and expansionist ambitions. Their malicious purpose is to kill two birds with one stone. However, because of the war of aggression against Kampuchea, the Le Duan clique has paid an enormous cost in manpower and wealth. The war burden is speeding up the collapse of Vietnam's inherently unstable economy. Although Vietnam has suffered a deficit for several consecutive years while being up to its ears in debt, the Le Duan clique has not yet changed its line and relinquished its policy of regional hegemonism and aggressive expansionism. On the contrary, it has continued to dash along the same track and to stubbornly tie Vietnam to the war chariot of Soviet expansionism.

In order to maintain its huge military machinery, with its more than 1 million troops, and to make up its huge financial deficit, the Le Duan clique, in addition to frantically exploiting the Vietnamese people, is seeking to make money illegally by trafficking in opium. This is like giving a seriously ill person an injection of morphine; this can only soothe his pain temporarily, not cure his disease and save his life.

It is obvious that while other trades are declining, only the opium traffic is prospering and is seen as the best remedy for Vietnam's declining economy.

INDIA COMMEMORATES 35TH INDEPENDENCE DAY

[Text] New Delhi, August 15 (XINHUA) -- India today celebrated its 35th Independence Day with Prime Minister Indira Gandhi unfurling the national flag on the ramparts of the historic Red Fort. In her speech devoted mainly to the internal situation, Mrs. Gandhi repeatedly referred to the threats being posed to the country's unity and sovereignty by elements whose sole objective was to create hatred among different religions, castes and regions and thus weaken the nation. She called for a concerted effort to maintain unity of this ancient sub-continent to preserve the hard-earned freedom.

Mrs. Gandhi appealed to the people, particularly the youth, to inculcate in them a sense of service and sacrifice, which was demonstrated by the nation during the struggle for freedom. On the eve of the Independence Day, President Zail Singh made his first broadcast to the nation since his election a month ago. He noted that the country had made rapid progress since 1947 but its pace had to be quickened. He said: "In recent years we have successfully launched many schemes for the benefit of the poor and the down-trodden with encouraging results." He added: "There is still a long way for us to travel for the removal of poverty, hunger, unemployment and disease and for raising further the living standards of our people."

NEPALESE KING DEFENDS PEACE ZONE PROPOSAL

[Text] Kathmandu, August 14 (XINHUA) -- Nepal's proposal to declare itself a zone of peace is motivated with the desire to ensure peace and tranquillity in the region and the world, King Birendra said here yesterday, according to RSS. The king said this while receiving credentials from ambassador of Yugoslavia.

The king observed that the Nepalese people strongly believe that their national development is inseparably linked with peace. "That is why Nepal, while launching all out efforts for development, also sincerely works for the cause of peace," he said.

The king noted that the Non-Aligned Movement has developed into a strong force in the world in favour of peace and equitable economic cooperation. However, he added, the Non-Aligned Movement is also facing many new challenges which call for greater dynamism and dedication among all non-aligned countries.

"We have no doubt that the principles of non-alignment which were enunciated more than two decades ago, are equally valid in the present context," the king said.

PRC MAGAZINE VIEWS WEST GERMAN-U.S. RELATIONS

HK090354 Beijing GUOJI WENTI YANJIU in Chinese No 3 Jul 82 pp 29-33

[Article by Mei Rong [2734 2837]: "Current German-U.S. Relations"]

[Text] After World War II, German-U.S. cooperation was heralded as "the cornerstone of the Atlantic Alliance." But recently, especially since Reagan's coming to power, there have been frequent disturbances in German-U.S. relations. The heated disputes and the wide divergences have reached an extent not seen since the war. As the two strongest powers in the Western bloc, the fierce wrangling between them has gained the focus of attention of world opinion.

All Kinds of Differences

At present, the main divergences between the two sides are manifested as follows:

1. How to estimate the "achievements" of the policy of detente? The Soviet Union has intensified the deployment of SS-20 MRBM's, outrageously dispatched troops to invade Afghanistan and supported the practice of martial law in Poland. Against this background, West Germany has admitted that detente has suffered setbacks, but it still insists that detente has stabilized the situation in Europe and has brought three favorable conditions to the West, particularly West Germany. First, it has promoted the tide of reform and peaceful evolution in East Europe, stimulated the trend of independence and movement away from the Soviet Union, and provided political and moral means to the West for putting pressure on the Soviet Union. Second, it has provided economic benefits to Western Europe, particularly West Germany, opened up an important commercial market for the West and increased the supply of raw material and energy. Take, for example, trade between West Germany and the Soviet Union. From 1970 to 1980 the total amount of trade between the two countries increased from DM23 billion to DM153 billion, increasing by 500 percent. Third, it has loosened relations between East and West Germany, allowing millions of people from West Germany to visit East Germany every year. This has alleviated the suffering among the Germans caused by the split of Germany, helped to maintain the sense of national unity of the people of East and West Germany, improved the situation of West Berlin and cooled down this crisis hotbed.

The Reagan Administration differs with the above opinions. Although it has not openly given up the detente policy, up to now it still holds an attitude of deep suspicion toward the detente policy; in fact, it holds that so far, the detente policy has failed, or at least the West has lost more than it has gained. Its thesis is: The Soviet Union has taken advantage of detente to gain a large amount of capital, technology and equipment, thus enabling it to divert more effort to expanding armaments, penetrating and extending toward the Third World and putting the West in an unfavorable strategic situation. The Soviet Union has strengthened its penetration of Western Europe in the course of detente and has especially promoted the trend of "neutralization" in West Germany, thus playing a role in disintegrating the Western alliance. Although the West has provided about $800 billion in loans to the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe, it has been unable to get any member of the Warsaw Pact organization to draw closer to the West.

2. There are different opinions on the "balance of power" of military forces of the East and West. In particular, emphasis on NATO's "dual decision" differs. When Reagan came to power, the very first thing he stressed was to increase strength as a top priority task for the West in order to gain parity with the Soviet superiority in SS-20 missiles. Therefore, he advocated deployment first and negotiation second, and the negotiations should have "linkage" with the Soviet Union's behavior throughout the world. On the other hand, West Germany claims that deployment and negotiation should have "equal weight" and neither should be overemphasized at the expense of the other.

As a matter of fact, West Germany wants to emphasize the negotiations. Under the pressure of West Germany and the Western European allies, the United States was forced to agree to negotiations with the Soviet Union on reduction of nuclear weapons in the European theater starting at the end of last November. It also had to accept the idea of West Germany and put forward the famous "zero option." But they have completely different plans in mind: The United States aims at deployment; it wants to balance the military forces by augmenting their strength, striving to gain superiority under the disguise of negotiations; whereas West Germany regards deployment as a measure for pressing the Soviet Union to make concession, and seeks to gain no or less deployment through negotiations and a "low-level balance of power." That is why West Germany urged the United States again and again to hold "serious negotiations," while the United States was appeasing West Germany and trying to constantly show "sincerity for negotiations."

Particularly noteworthy is the fact that in the course of the dispute, the public opinion of both sides suspect each other, and even rake up the past and attack each other. As regards Chancellor Schmidt's pressing the United States to negotiate with the Soviet Union and his proclaiming himself to be an "interpreter" between the two superpowers, certain U.S. political circles, periodicals and public opinion ask West Germany if it is trying to play the card of "neutrality" between the Soviet Union and the United States. Some articles even urge a withdrawal of U.S. military forces from West Germany to let that country rely on the Soviet Union's "good will". On the other hand, the "leftwing" of the Social Democratic Party of West Germany and its public opinion have also seized on Reagan's talk with correspondents last winter on the "possibility of a limited nuclear war in Europe" between the two superpowers and have asked whether the United States is trying to turn West Germany into a nuclear battleground to prevent U.S. territory from being attacked. Mr Gauss, the former representative of West Germany to East Germany, even asked NATO to restore the "strategy of massive retaliation" in order to constrain the United States from slipping in critical moments or limiting the battlefield to Europe. Although these polemics between West Germany and the United States do not fully represent the governments of the two sides, they are by no means without a background.

3. Is it necessary to apply economic sanctions against the Soviet Union? After Poland instituted martial law, the United States stressed that the Soviet Union was the backstage boss and declared economic sanctions against the Soviet Union. It also asked its allies to act in response, attempting to put pressure on Poland to abolish martial law, allow the legal existence of the "Solidarity" trade union and restore dialogue. But West Germany refused to take part in the economic sanctions. Its reasons are: Economic sanctions cannot prevent the Soviet Union from expanding armaments. On the contrary, it will create a "siege mentality" by which it can intensify its control at home, force the people to tighten their belts, further worsen East-West relations and make the West incapable of affecting the internal affairs of Eastern Europe. Schmidt declared in public: Since the West has never been able to respond practically to military intervention within the Soviet sphere of influence, it would be better to give the matter further thought and seek to transform the reality of the Warsaw Pact through peaceful evolution within Eastern Europe. Although this method of evolution has been suppressed by Soviet military force many times, the West should not lose faith because the inherent weaknesses of the Soviet system make it impossible for the Soviets to prevent the people's desire for reform. The development of economic cooperation between East and West makes it possible for the Soviet Union to seek help from the West; it is precisely Western influence on Eastern Europe that has caused this evolution, and it is also an important measure in deterring the Soviet Union from using force for its economic interest.

The Reagan administration has no faith in the so-called "theory of evolution" proposed by West Germany. On the contrary, it is stepping up efforts to put pressure on West Germany to abandon the gas pipeline deal, which had been discussed between West Germany and the Soviet Union for a long time. The U.S. side points out: This huge deal may lead West Germany to "dangerously rely" on the Soviet Union for energy and place it in a situation of being blackmailed politically, therefore affecting its reliability in the alliance. What is more, if this cooperation is realized, then starting in 1984 the Soviet Union can gain a large amount of foreign currency in selling natural gas every year, enabling it to further expand armaments and build more missiles to deal with the West. On the one hand, West Germany has tried to provide an explanation: If this project is accomplished, the natural gas imported from the Soviet Union will amount to only 30 percent of West Germany's total consumption of natural gas and will only account for 5.5 to 6 percent of its total energy consumption. This will not place West Germany in a "dangerous situation of dependence on others." This deal can also bring about many orders, so it is favorable for reducing unemployment and promoting social stability. On the other hand, West Germany has asked the United States in reply: If you want to give the Soviet Union a deadly blow, the best and most effective way is to stop the sale of grain to the Soviet Union. Why is it that the Reagan administration rescinded the embargo decision of the Carter administration?

4. How to hold back the Soviet Union's penetration and expansion in the Third World? When analyzing the turmoil in the Third World countries, the Reagan administration frequently "draws a line against the Soviet Union," simply attributing the cause of the turmoil to the penetration and meddling of the Soviet Union and its agents. As a countermeasure, it resorts to supporting military dictatorships and pays particular attention to the means of adopting military oppression. The U.S. practice in El Salvador is an example. West Germany holds that the fundamental reason for the turmoil in these countries is the wide gap between the rich and the poor and unjust distribution in society. The meddling of the Soviet Union and its agents should be a secondary factor. The West should help these countries to gradually carry out reforms in order to prevent radical armed struggle and thereby reduce or eliminate the possibility of Soviet meddling and enable the West to expand its influence by relying on its economic and technical superiority. Therefore, West Germany advocates supporting the pro-Western "democratic forces" and opposing the notorious military dictatorships supported by the United States.

5. Conflict of interests in economic policies. In order to control inflation in the United States, the Reagan administration has pursued a policy of high interest rates, causing an outflow of capital from West Germany and a devaluation of the mark. This is a grave blow to West Germany at a time when it is urgently in need of capital to stimulate investment and solve the problem of unemployment. If West Germany cannot revive its economy, the unemployment rate is bound to increase and cause social turmoil and an unstable political situation. Consequently, West Germany has demanded that the United States cut interest rates. Schmidt has said that the high U.S. interest rates have had a "destructive influence" on West Germany and are "unacceptable." The United States has ignored this West German demand and has continued to go its own way.

Source and Essence

The development of the contradictions between West Germany and the United States is not an accidental and isolated matter. The source is that both countries differ in strategic position, military strength and politics and economy, which also reflect the current intensifying contention between the Soviet Union and the United States. There are many reasons for the above-mentioned differences of view, and they are intricate and complicated. They are mainly shown below:

1. The military strength of the two countries differs immensely, and the strategic aims they seek also differ. The United States regards pursuit of world hegemony as its task; Reagan often proceeds from the contention for hegemony between the two superpowers. He feels that detente weakens the U.S. strategic position. Meanwhile, West Germany seeks the establishment of a "multipolar world" to attempt to gain more room for maneuver among the keen competition between many different forces, and is also more concerned for relative tranquillity in Europe. As a superpower, the United States will certainly not be reconciled to being in a defensive situation strategically but will try to offset or even surpass the Soviet Union militarily in certain respects. While West Germany is more concerned about the "balance" of forces in the East and West, it fears the Soviet Union's maintaining and increasing its military superiority. But, at the same time, West Germany is also unwilling to see the United States trying to prevail over the Soviet Union, which causes an unlimited escalation of the arms race. As a nuclear power, the United States is always trying to conduct a foreign policy dependent on its military strength, while West Germany, being a vanquished nation and possessing no nuclear weapons, conducts a foreign policy relying mainly on its economic and technical strength. Therefore, the two countries place a different emphasis on the issue of what kind of method to apply in the contest with the Soviet superpower. All these differences are important reasons why the two countries have differences over the policy of detente and disarmament.

2. The situations of the two countries, including the conditions of the people, are also different. West Germany is situated on the frontline of the two great military blocs of East and West confronting each other. German territory has the greatest concentrations of nuclear weapons and conventional troops. In relations between East and West and the problem of West Berlin, West Germany is controlled by the Soviet Union. Therefore, in any deterioration in East-West relations, West Germany will be the first to suffer, and should war break out, Germany is sure to be a battlefield.

Due to this kind of situation, on the one hand, West Germany needs the nuclear deterrent and the protection of U.S. troops stationed there. On the other, it has to do its utmost to keep in touch with the Soviet Union in detente and to actively promote "dialogue" between the United States and the Soviet Union. Schmidt has stressed again and again, the more tension and the more dangerous the international situation, the more we have to keep open the channels for dialogue between East and West. In the opinion of West Germany, the foreign policy of "transcendence" practiced by the two superpowers in sacrificing the interests of West Europe must be opposed. But tension in relations between the Soviet Union and the United States may also leave West Germany with scarcely any room for maneuver. Provided the "atmosphere" of relations between the Soviet Union and the United States preserves detente, West Germany can benefit and maneuver between the two. The weakness of West Germany in withstanding the Soviet Union is always exploited by the Soviet Union, and it is therefore suspected by the United States.

Moreover, along with the increasing factors of war and the intensifying contention of the two superpowers, the mentality of fear of war among the German masses, who have experienced two world wars, is increasing and a mammoth peace movement has appeared. The Schmidt government is greatly constrained by these actions and forced to show more solicitude for the sentiments of the masses in its strategy. On the other hand, Reagan came to power following the events in Iran and Afghanistan, when public opinion demanded a rallying of forces and a tough attitude toward the Soviet Union in order to turn the tide in favor of the United States. Recently, there has been a rapid development of the peace and antinuclear movement in the United States. But the majority of the masses still hold that the Soviet Union is the greatest menace to the country and should be treated seriously. Against such a background, the tone of the German-U.S. tune toward the Soviet Union does not sound in harmony.

3. The two countries differ in ideas on the advantages and disadvantages in developing economic relations between West and East. West Germany is a trading nation. One out of every four employees is engaged in import and export trade service; most of the raw materials and energy have to be imported from abroad. Therefore, its dependence on other countries is far greater than that of the United States. Historically, the Soviet Union and East Europe have been the traditional market for West Germany, and now West Germany is also one of the biggest Western trading partners of the Soviet Union. The country is the main market for a number of West German products. For instance, the number of automatic lathes exported to the Soviet Union accounts for 64.5 percent of the total output of these products in West Germany, and heavy caliber steel tubing 60 percent. Trade between West Germany and the Soviet Union provides employment for several hundred thousand West Germans. As to raw materials and energy, West Germany relies to a certain extent on the Soviet Union for the enriched uranium it needs for nuclear power stations, natural gas and several rare metals. Comparing this with the United States, not only does that country need no energy from the Soviet Union, but its industrial exports there are insignificant in U.S. foreign trade. Therefore, West Germany maintains, the United States is carrying out an embargo against the Soviet Union in industrial products, and except for grain, this kind of sanction policy not only lacks conviction, but it causes more harm to West Europe, particularly West Germany, than it does to the Soviet Union.

4. Owing to the transformation of the nuclear balance between the Soviet Union and the United States, West Germany's suspicions about the reliability of the U.S. nuclear umbrella have increased. After World War II, the nuclear umbrella and the U.S. troops stationed in West Germany were always considered a secure and reliable assurance to West Germany. However, along with the bringing into balance of the strategic nuclear forces between the two superpowers and the dissension sown by the Soviet Union, West Germany is becoming more and more suspicious about whether the United States is willing to risk the danger of being attacked by the Soviet Union and use strategic nuclear weapons to defend Western Europe. In 1977, with the revelation of the 10th memorandum of the U.S. President on the U.S. intention to give up one-third of West Germany's territory in case the Soviet Union launches a war in Europe, the government and the public of West Germany lodged strong protests against the United States. In 1979, when Schmidt agreed to the deployment of land-based MRBM's by the United States, one of his motives was to bind America. But after Reagan's speech on the possibility of limited nuclear war in Europe, certain press circles in West Germany were worried that the United States was attempting to "Europeanize" nuclear war, so West Germany became less and less confident in America.

5. The transformation of the balance of strength between West Germany and the United States increased West Germany's self-confidence and urge to maintain independence and keep the initiative in its own hands. From the end of World War II to the 1960's, the United States was always the head of the Western alliance and regarded West Germany only as a small partner. From the 1970's, West Germany's economic strength further increased. At present, it has the largest foreign currency reserves in the world and is second in the world in gold reserves. Especially when West Germany signed the treaty with the Soviet Union on the mutual non-use of armed force and established normal relations with Eastern Europe, it was not willing to be controlled by the United States. It demanded equal status with the United States, and its demand for maintaining independence and keeping the initiative in its own hands was enhanced. In August 1980, in a talk with a journalist of KOELNER STADTANZEIGER, Schmidt said: Current West Germany-U.S. relations are quite different from those of 15, 20 or 25 years ago. At that time, West Germany "was in a subordinate position." Now it is a major partner of the United States. West Germany cannot "accept any U.S. standpoint unconditionally and without criticism." On another occasion, Schmidt told an American journalist: West Germany and the United States have "different interests." The United States should treat the European allies as "equal partners," and the European allies will refuse to "completely agree with the U.S. standpoint without prior consultation after hearing the ambiguous and vague opinions of Washington."

It is quite obvious that West Germany wants to think independently, go its own way and safeguard its own interests. It does not want to submissively obey the United States.

6. Both countries face different kinds of problems in economic policy and have different ways of dealing with them. Each tries to shift its troubles onto others in order to protect its own interests. Since the 1970's, the economies of the Western countries further proceeded from slowdown toward stagnation and decline. According to its own conditions, each country has the following two methods of dealing with and overcoming the crisis: The first one is countering inflation, the main method used being to curtail currency growth, raise interest rates and restrict consumption, etc.; the other method is to mainly solve unemployment and adopt measures to increase public spending and reduce interest rates in order to stimulate investments, promote economic expansion and provide more employment opportunities for the unemployed. Both methods have their advantages and disadvantages: The former will increase unemployment while the latter will intensify inflation. Up to present, none of the Western countries can think of a method that can satisfy both sides. Therefore, there is always the phenomena of attending to one thing and losing sight of another, a heap of problems that require solving and constant swaying between the two. In the Carter period, the United States mainly tried to solve the unemployment problem, whereas West Germany was trying to check inflation. Therefore, the United States wanted West Germany to stimulate its economy and play "the role of locomotive" to lead the West out of economic troubles. This was refused by West Germany. Today, Reagan is dealing mainly with inflation, while West Germany has to solve the problem of unemployment. The two countries have changed their role.

Trends and Prospects

Will the contradictions between West Germany and the United States help the development of neutralist trends in West Germany or lead West Germany to separate from the Western camp one day? This is a problem frequently raised by international public opinion. If we comprehensively view the relations between the two countries, the answer is negative. We should say that the unity between the two countries in resisting the Soviet Union will still be the leading aspect of their relationship in the near future. Although their differences are acute in some matters, after all, they are only secondary. This is because the social systems and the sense of being of the two countries are the same. What is more, their unity in resisting the Soviet Union is the fundamental interest of both sides.

Strategically, the two sides need each other, and neither can do without the other. West Germany is situated in an important strategic position. It has solid economic and technical strength and a great military potential. Therefore, it is an important U.S. ally in Western Europe. The United States has stationed 230,000 conventional troops and stored 6,000 tactical nuclear warheads in West Germany. According to the NATO decision on strengthening armaments, from 1983 572 MRBM's will be deployed in Western Europe, with the greatest number in West Germany, including 108 Pershing-II missiles and 98 cruise missiles. West Germany is a U.S. outpost in coping with the Soviet Union. West Germany has provided NATO with 500,000 well-equipped ground forces and a considerable navy and air force, thus forming a hard core of NATO in Europe. Some people say that the United States and West Germany are the two pillars of NATO and this is no exaggeration. From a certain point of view, if the United States loses West Germany, it would mean losing the whole of Western Europe. If it loses Western Europe, the U.S. strategic situation will fundamentally change. Therefore, the United States will never abandon West Germany and will never allow West Germany to become "neutral." On the contrary, in a different sense the United States is also indispensable to West Germany.

In addition to the U.S. nuclear umbrella and troops which are a guarante for West German security, the United States also has the "responsibility" in the reunification of Germany. Meanwhile, the United States is the supreme power in West Berlin. If West Germany wants to withstand Soviet pressure on the German and West Berlin problems it cannot do so without the U.S. Furthermore, the detente would be out of the question.

Economically, the capital of the two countries penetrates each other. According to the figures of the "Modern Commerce Studies" published in August 1981 by the Economic Analysis Bureau of the Commerce Department of America, up to the end of 1980, American investment in West Germany amounted to $15.39 billion, 7.2 percent of the total (213.4 billion) U.S. overseas investment. This proportion is tending to increase. Half the electronics industry of West Germany is managed by the American capitalists. On the other side, West Germany's investment in the United States reached $5.29 billion, about 8 percent of total foreign investment (65.48 billion) in the United States. This kind of economic situation, with each relying on the other, binds them in a common cause.

On the feelings of the people in regard to confronting the aggressive menace of the Soviet Union, the majority of West Germans support NATO and agree to an alliance with the United States. According to a poll conducted in 1981 in five West European countries by the USICA, it was found that 65 percent of the West Germans support NATO, far more than in the United Kingdom (59 percent), the Netherlands (56 percent) and Italy (50 percent), countries which are well-known for intimate relations with the United States. A Gallup poll in 1982 shows that in the proportion of "very good" or "fairly good" impressions of America, West Germany was also the first among European allies. More important, among the main political parties in West Germany, except the "left wing" of the Social Democratic Party and the Free Democratic Party, which have anti-U.S. feelings, the rightist leaders of the Social Democratic Party and the Free Democratic Party and the Christian Democratic Union and the Christian Social Union all stand firmly by NATO and agree with alliance to the United States.

As a matter of fact, it is the overall unity in resisting the Soviet Union that demands that each of the two sides, after acute argument, makes a concession and reaches a compromise. For example, in the MRBM negotiations, the United States has in fact given up the principle of "linkage," while West Germany guaranteed again and again that up to 1983, if there are no results in the negotiations, it will agree to the deployment of MRBM's in West Germany. On the Poland problem, the United States has approved of West Germany not taking part in economic sanctions against the Soviet Union. West Germany has also accepted the standpoint that the Soviet Union should "be responsible" in the Poland problem. On the gas pipeline deal, although the United States has retained its attitude of opposition, it still allows West Germany to carry on with its implementation. In this case, the Soviet attempts to draw West Germany to its side and intrigue to wreck the U.S.-German alliance is in vain. Anyhow, the German-U.S. contradictions are bound to come and go and give the Soviet Union an opportunity to exploit an advantage, thus causing more acute contention between the United States and the Soviet Union over West Germany.

ISRAELI PLANES AGAIN BOMBARD WEST BEIRUT

[Text] Beirut, August 12 (XINHUA) -- The Israeli authorities again sent war planes to bombard west Beirut today as the negotiations on the evacuation of the Palestinian guerrillas are within sight. The 11-hour bombardment started from 6 a.m. It was the most violent air raid on west Beirut since Israel invaded Lebanon in early June.

According to the Palestinian news agency, the Fakehani and Sabra refugee camps, where the PLO was headquartered, were completely destroyed. 500 Palestinian fighters were either killed or wounded during the bombing.

Lebanese President Ilyas Sarkis and Prime Minister Shafiq al-Wazzan discussed the worsening military situation with U.S. envoy Philip Habib this morning, angrily denouncing Israel's military blackmail. Al-Wazzan held Habib and the United States responsible for the extermination of Beirut. He pointed out that in the interest of a peaceful settlement of the Beirut crisis, the Palestinian people have done everything they could to meet every demand from Lebanon. The prime minister also questioned the reason of Israel's new massacre, which took place after the PLO had decided to pull out from Beirut. He announced that Lebanon cannot continue the negotiations under Israel's military blackmail.

U.S. ambassador to Israel today warned Israeli Prime Minister Menahem Begin that the United States will call back its envoy and stop the political negotiations if Israel does not halt its military action. The Israeli Cabinet held a special meeting this afternoon to discuss further action in Lebanon. Israeli radio reported that the Cabinet meeting was the "most difficult" one. An Israeli deputy prime minister and the minister of internal affairs reportedly expressed their open objection to the successive bombardments on Beirut which were masterminded by Israeli Defense Minister Ariel Sharon.

PLO REJECTS NEW ISRAELI WITHDRAWAL CONDITIONS

[Text] Beirut, August 14 (XINHUA) -- A senior PLO official announced today that the Palestine Liberation Organization rejects Israel's new conditions for evacuation but sticks to the political agreement reached with the Lebanese Government and U.S. envoy Philip Habib. Abu Iyad, member of the Central Council of the PLO, claimed in an interview with French newspaper that the PLO refuses to offer names of the Palestinian evacuees to Israel. He reiterated that the PLO's refusal to accept Israel's new conditions does not mean it has changed the decision to pull out of Beirut.

The Beirut paper AS-SAFIR today quoted diplomatic sources as saying that Israel's five new conditions may put off the evacuation of the Palestinian guerrillas from Beirut.

The new conditions are:

1) Israeli rejection to the acceptance of international observers to supervise the ceasefire;

2) Israeli rejection to the deployment of the multi-national force in Beirut prior to the evacuation of the Palestinian fighters;

3) Israeli demand for the departure [words indistinct] Palestinians who have lived in Lebanon since 1948;

4) Israeli demand for the release of the captured Israeli pilots; and

5) Israeli demand for the exchange of nine corpses of Israeli soldiers.

The paper said that the leaders of the Palestine Liberation Organization have unanimously decided not to make any new concession even if it leads to the break-up of the political agreement.

XINHUA VIEWS LEBANESE CRISIS, ISRAELI AIMS

[Commentary by XINHUA correspondent Wan Guang: "Lebanese Crisis and Israel's Ambitions"]

[Text] Cairo, 12 Aug (XINHUA) -- People here in Cairo believe that the withdrawal of Palestinian resistance forces from west Beirut does not necessarily mean the end of the Lebanese crisis and easing of the contradictions between Palestine and Israel. Israel will continue its military occupation of Lebanon, and Lebanon will continue to face turmoil and even the danger of dismemberment. The Arab world will face even greater threats, and the entire Middle East will find itself in greater unrest.

Israel may drive all Palestinian fighters out of west Beirut, but it cannot evict the 500,000 Palestinian refugees in Lebanon. The Israeli military authorities on 22 July admitted that there were hundreds of Palestinian guerillas operating in southern Lebanon with the support of the local people. In Tripoli, in northern Lebanon, there are thousands more Palestinian fighters. It is said that in the Bekaa Plain, which is under the control of the Syrian forces, there are 10,000 more Palestinian fighters, including veterans who withdrew from southern Lebanon and Palestinian volunteers who came from other countries.

Yasir 'Arafat, chairman of the Executive Committee of the Palestine Liberation Organization [PLO] has repeatedly expressed willingness to recognize Israel's right of existence. The Begin regime, however, has refused to recognize the PLO, threatening to annex eventually the West Bank and Gaza. The United States has also refused to have a direct dialogue with the PLO and to recognize the Palestinian people's right to self-determination. U.S. Secretary of State Shultz was said to be ready to talk about Camp David autonomy, but even Egypt has pointed out that he would have nothing to talk about.

What the United States has done in collaboration with Israel is to forcibly compel the PLO to withdraw from west Beirut in accordance with conditions and a time limit they have set. On the other hand, they delayed the Israeli troops' withdrawal until the so-called restoration of central government power in Lebanon. All this has created favorable conditions for Israel to realize its aggressive ambitions.

Public opinion has indicated that the Israeli troops will continue to occupy Lebanon for a while. The Israeli aggression against Lebanon is not only aimed at wiping out or driving out the Palestinian forces, it is also aimed at putting the Lebanese government under its control or, at least, at putting some areas in southern Lebanon under its permanent occupation or virtual control and weaking as much as possible the Syrian forces in Lebanon or even driving them out of the country. It seems that Israel will not withdraw from Lebanon willingly until it has basically attained these goals. The Israeli military authorities have already declared that they are preparing the aggressor troops for the winter. Israel has removed the local Lebanese administration in some places in southern Lebanon by establishing an occupation regime with civilians replacing the military personnel.

As for Saida and some other southern Lebanese cities, Israel has newly constructed a highway leading to Lebanon. Israeli money has been circulated in the occupied areas in Lebanon while Jewish goods are pouring in. Israel has also claimed that "historic relics" indicating that Saida paid tribute to Israel in the past have been found. All these are signs that Israel is trying to occupy Lebanon, particularly its southern areas, over a protracted period. Authoritative sources here believe that Israel's attack on the Palestinian forces is aimed at annexing the West Bank and the Gaza Strip and controlling Lebanon, at least its southern part. It is only part of the "greater Israeli plan."

The press in Egypt and many other Arab countries has expressed the worry that the crisis in Lebanon will also spread to other Arab countries if Israel is allowed to go unbridled in pursuit of its objectives under the U.S. aegis. Taking advantage of the split in the Arab world, the two superpowers, the United States and the Soviet Union, are intensifying their struggle to expand their spheres of influence in the Middle East. Some Arabs think that the next 10 years may be the "Arabs' most dangerous years." However, not a few Egyptians believe that the failure and humiliation will awaken people and inspire them to work hard and unite, although it will mean going through more suffering and through a tortuous course.

AFP: AFRICAN STUDENTS AT EMBASSY BURN DOCUMENTS

[Excerpt] Beijing, Aug. 15 (AFP) -- A group of Central African students occupying their country's embassy here for almost a week set fire to documents and other materials in the embassy today. The students said it was a "warning" to Nicolas Bengue, the embassy's charge d'affaires, for his refusal to relay their grievances to the Central African capital of Bangui.

The four youths took over the embassy last Monday to protest the non-payment of their scholarship money from their government, and barred Central African and local staff from entering the building. The students stacked up a photocpier, typewriters and other documents in the embassy courtyard and set fire to them. They indicated the burnt articles came from the office of Mr. Bengue, the only Central African diplomat currently in Beijing. Ambassador Auguste Mboe is on leave back in his country.

"This is a warning for his refusal to show up at the embassy and relay our messages to Bangui," one student said. During the week Chinese authorities had asked the students to leave the embassy but they refused.

STATE COUNCIL REMOVES VICE CHEMICAL MINISTER

OW131316 Beijing XINHUA Domestic Service in Chinese 1153 GMT 13 Aug 82

[Text] Beijing, 13 Aug (XINHUA) -- The State Council adopted a resolution on 11 August taking disciplinary action against Comrade Yang Yibang and removing him from his post.

The resolution points out: In carrying out economic and foreign affairs activities during the second half of 1978 and 1979, Comrade Yang Yibang, vice minister of chemical industry, failed to earnestly conduct investigations and study and ignored the reference materials and advice offered by the departments concerned. He carried out various activities abroad without going through the Chinese organs stationed in foreign countries and repeatedly violated discipline. He left himself at the mercy of foreign businessmen, yielded to their demands, extorted and accepted bribes in disguised form, violated the state rules and regulations for guarding security and brought tremendous losses to the prestige and economic interests of the state.

The State Council resolution pointed out: Comrade Yang Yibang's errors are serious. In view of his good work and achievements in the past and his efforts to conduct self-examination and see his own mistakes, the State Council decided to take disciplinary action against Comrade Yang Yibang on the basis of the principle of "learning from past mistakes to avoid future ones and curing the sickness to save the patient" and, on the recommendation of the Central Discipline Inspection Commission, by removing him from his post as vice minister of chemical industry. Comrade Yang Yibang should learn a lesson from this mistake, strengthen his party spirit, and raise his ideological level. It is hoped that he will score new achievements in the future.

LABOR VICE MINISTER ON EMPLOYMENT PROBLEMS

[Report: "Struggle Goes on To Find More Jobs"]

He said that in the first two years of that period 11 million people were placed, but an average of 8.7 million a year were found jobs in the succeeding three years. He Guang said this quickening tempo had been brought about by the development of collective and individual economies in towns over the last three years. He said the toughest time for employment was at the end of 1978. The rate of people awaiting jobs then was 5.3 percent which, through the opening of new opportunities, dropped to 2.6 percent by 1981.

The new enterprises accepted about 39 percent of the 26 million employed during the 1979-81 period -- 35 percent by collective enterprises and 4 percent by individual businesses.

These recruits for collective ownership mainly went into handicrafts, light industry, commerce, restaurants, daily services and repairing businesses. This corresponded with the new requirements resulting from the changes in industrial structure, he said.

Within three years, number of small retail shops, caterers and repairs works increased by 150 percent. Their staff and workers totaled more than 16.24 million -- an increase of 73 percent. Even so, he said, it was still below the peak level in history.

The domination of socialist public ownership is the fundamental principle under which the various components of the economy can be interwoven to help the nation prosper. To help achieve this, the labour service corporation has been established and has already resulted in work for more than 2.7 million people. However, the development of employment prospects is not balanced.

Some medium and small-sized cities and towns such as Nantong and Changzhou are taking the lead in eliminating unemployment, while some inland counties still encounter difficulties in finding jobs for their unemployed even though they may total only a few hundred people.

Historical and geological conditions do play some part in it, but whether or not their economic activities flourished was the key point, said He Guang.

There are about 6 million people, including graduates and demobilized servicemen, in need of assignments each year. But the harder task seems to be the redistribution of millions of personnel made redundant through the readjustment of enterprises. There, the vice minister plans to establish a system of labour reserve, putting all graduates, casual labourers and superfluous employees together for easier job selection.

NAVY COMMANDER AT CEREMONY HONORING XISHA UNIT

[Text] Beijing, 14 Aug (XINHUA) -- An honor ceremony was held in Beijing to carry out the order of the CPC Central Committee Military Commission conferring on the navy garrison unit on Zhongjian Island in the Xisha Archipelago the honorable title "the patriotic, island-loving sentinels in the remotest place." In the name of the CPC Central Committee Military Commission, Fu Jize, deputy commander of the navy, read the Military Commission's order conferring the honorable title on the garrison unit on Zhongjian Island. Navy Commander Ye Fei presented the citation banner of the Military Commission to Zhang Yanzeng, political instructor of the garrison unit.

In his speech at the meeting, Li Yaowen, political commissar of the navy, urged naval commanders and fighters to enthusiastically respond to the Military Commission's call, earnestly learn from the Zhongjian Island garrison unit, and foster an upsurge in learning from, catching up with and surpassing the advanced unit in an effort to expeditiously build a modern, regular and revolutionary navy. The decision of the navy's party committee on launching activities to learn from the "patriotic, island-loving sentinels in the remotest place" was read out at the meeting.

Zhang Yanzeng, political instructor of the Zhongjian Island garrison unit, spoke at the meeting. He expressed determination to translate the honorable title conferred on the unit into a driving force and to win new merits in defending and building the island and in promoting socialist spiritual civilization.

Celebrated painters Wu Zuoren and Bai Xueshi wielded their brushes to produce paintings for the garrison unit on Zhongjian Island. Shao Yu, Dong Shouping and Fan Zeng presented their works to the coastal defense heroes to express the people's respect for them.

NEW NAVAL DESTROYER COMPLETES TEST MISSIONS

Since its launching, vessel 105 has taken on scientific missions to test the equipment and armament developed for new types of warships. The commanders and fighters on board have displayed a revolutionary spirit of self-reliance and hard struggle and have overcome various hardships and hazards. Aside from having sailed more than 50,000 nautical miles in the motherland's vast waters of the Bohai Gulf, Yellow Sea and East China Sea, they have successfully accomplished over 1,000 trial missions in close cooperation with the production and scientific research departments. Scores of these missions were the first of their kind ever conducted by this country and were the primary and most difficult tasks carried out during the voyage.

The successful tests conducted by vessel 105 have provided the scientific data for developing and building new types of warships. During their scientific testing missions, crew members of the vessel compiled 280 rules and regulations for modern guided missile destroyers and submitted more than 1,000 rational suggestions to scientific research units of departments concerned under the navy. Some 800 of those suggestions have been accepted. The destroyer has trained more than 200 technicians for other naval vessels.

FIRST GRADUATES FOR DOCTORAL DEGREES ENROLLED

[Text] Beijing, August 14 (XINHUA) -- China's first graduate students to study for doctoral degrees, 420 in all, have just been enrolled by 54 colleges and 15 research institutions, the State Council's academic degrees committee announced here today.

The committee's general secretary, Huang Xinbai, said that among the students to begin studies soon, 191 would major in science, 137 in engineering, 60 in medicine, 16 in literature, 11 in history, two in philosophy, two in pedagogy and one in agronomy. He said that enrollment had started last November and most of them have received masters degrees.

Also a vice-minister of education, Huang Xinbai said China would begin regular conferment of doctoral degrees when the newly enrolled students graduate in two or three years.

Speaking of the nine students who became China's first group to receive doctors degrees two months ago, Huang Xinbai explained that they had been selected from graduate students studying for masters degrees and made exceptions because of their extraordinary academic records. He said their tutors had encouraged them to study for doctoral degrees and taught them the new courses required.

NEW COLLEGE TO TRAIN UNIVERSITY LEADERS OPENS

[Text] Beijing, August 15 (XINHUA) -- A new college for training university leaders and provincial education bureau directors opened here today.

Zhang Chengxian, president of the Central College for Educational Administrators, spoke to the first class of nearly 200 students at this morning's opening ceremony.

Also a leading official of the Education Ministry, he said China now has 719 institutions of higher learning as compared with 205 when the People's Republic was founded in 1949. Due to such rapid development in education, he said, large numbers of cadres without competent education or professional knowledge were transferred to lead colleges and universities.

In the past two years, some 600 middle-aged and young faculty members have been promoted to leading posts in colleges nationwide. Despite their profound knowledge in teaching, Zhang Chengxian said, they need training in college administration. He suggested that the new college be developed into a higher learning research and data center, in addition to being a training base for administrators.

Located on the outskirts of Beijing, the college is close to the Great Wall and Ming Tombs, some 60 kilometers north of Beijing proper.

The college plans to set up five teaching-research sections of Marxism-Leninism, pedagogy, psychology, history of education and college administration.

The first class of students will study 10 courses, including philosophy, pedagogy, psychology, education economics and college management, for a period of six months.

The college will eventually increase the number of students to 800 with school periods ranging from six months to two years. Enrollment will be expanded to include principals of secondary technical schools and high schools, theoreticians, Education Ministry officials and aspirants to college leaders.

CAPITAL CONSTRUCTION PROJECT READJUSTMENT NOTED

[Text] China has made great achievements in readjusting capital construction in the past 3 years. The number of large and medium-sized projects under construction in China has been reduced by two-thirds and dropped to 600 or so in 1982. The scale of construction has been curtailed by one-third.

The drastic reduction in construction projects enables China to use its funds and materials in a more concentrated way and thus accelerate the construction of some major projects. The completion rate of large and medium-sized projects was 10.6 percent in 1981, while it was 8.3 percent in 1980. In 1981 the utility rate of fixed assets increased to 86.7 percent for the first time in many years. Some weak links in construction, such as projects for energy, transport and building materials, have been strengthened. This was made possible by the curtailment of capital construction and by readmustment in the orientation of investment. In the past 3 years, coal mining capability was increased by 35.95 million tons, electric power generating capacity by 10 million kilowatts and crude oil extracting capability by 18.94 million tons. The construction of light and textile industrial projects, urban housing and projects for improving the standard of the people's material and cultural life has increased by a very big margin. Achievements in housing construction are the most remarkable. In the past 3 years, completed houses totaled some 253 million square meters of floor space, equal to one-half the total houses completed in the 30 years after the founding of the People's Republic. The newly completed houses have solved the housing problem for about 5 million urban residents. In the first half of 1982, housing projects under construction in China increased by 18.5 percent in terms of floor space, compared with the first half of 1981.

RURAL COMMUNE-, BRIGADE-RUN ENTERPRISES DEVELOP

[Text] Beijing, 14 Aug (XINHUA) -- Enterprises run by China's rural communes and production brigades have developed rapidly since the convening of the 3d Plenary Session of the 11th CPC Central Committee. Economically and technically, they have become an important pillar for achieving agricultural modernization in our country, as well as a major component for the collective economic which is indispensable for promoting rural economy and improving the peasants' livelihood.

The enterprises' total annual income has increased from 43,140 million yuan in 1978 to 67,036 million yuan in 1981, a 55.4 percent increase in 3 years, with fixed assets reaching 37,500 million yuan. In 1981 their industrial output value comprised 10.8 percent of the country's total industrial output value, while export goods produced by the enterprises amounted to some 2,600 million yuan. In the 3 years from 1979 to 1981, the enterprises earned 33,568 million yuan in net profits, of which 6,609 million yuan has been spent on supporting agricultural production and construction, including 2,865 million yuan on farmland capital construction, 2,710 million yuan on purchasing agricultural machinery and 1,034 million yuan on subsidizing the production of poverty-stricken production teams. In addition, 2,476 million yuan has been spent on various rural subsidies.

The development of commune- and brigade-run enterprises has offered more employment for rural labor forces. Presently, 30 million people are employed by the enterprises and their total wages amounted to 13,063 million yuan in 1981, averaging some 16 yuan for each of the country's 800 million peasants. In some places, the enterprises return part of the profits to production teams for distribution, thereby increasing commune members' income. In 1981 the funds derived from profits for distribution among commune members totaled 2,016 million yuan. The enterprises also took 715 million yuan from the net profits to set up various collective welfare undertakings in rural areas.

The development of enterprises run by communes and brigades throughout the country has not only provided the funds and equipment and trained the technical personnel necessary for achieving agricultural modernization, but has also increased commune members' income.

The enterprises have also enabled nearly 10,000 towns in the country to become new towns which, with the enterprises as the mainstay, have the initial characteristics of both town and country and both industry and agriculture, as well as a certain number of cultural and welfare facilities.

DEVELOPMENT OF STATE FARM SITUATION OVERVIEWED

[Text] Since the 3d Plenary Session of the 11th CPC Central Committee, China's state farms and land reclamation department has seriously eliminated the influence of erroneous leftist thinking, readjusted the economic structure, improved management and fundamentally changed the face of its enterprises. In the past 3 years, it has increased its total industrial and agricultural output value at an average annual rate of 8.5 percent and earned a total profit of 1.289 billion yuan. In the 3 years, it delivered to the state 15.1 billion jin of commercial grain equal of one-third its total commercial grain delivery to the state in the past 3 decades or more.

The state farms and land reclamation department is a department of state-run, large-scale socialist agriculture with a fairly high degree of mechanization. In the past, it operated with losses for 12 consecutive years due to poor management. Since the 3d Plenary Session of the 11th CPC Central Committee, the state has fixed the financial responsibility of the state farms and land reclamation department and given it added decisionmaking powers. All state farms have restored or initiated the production responsibility system and implemented the socialist principle of to each according to his work, thus bringing into play the workers' socialist working initiative and promoting the development of production.

In 1979 the state farms and land reclamation department stopped its losses and earned a profit of some 396 million yuan. In 1981 state farms in more than 10 provinces, municipalities and autonomous regions suffered serious natural disasters, but the state farms and land reclamation department still earned a profit of some 230 million yuan.

ACHIEVEMENTS IN COMPUTER RESEARCH REPORTED

[Excerpts] Beijing, 13 Aug (XINHUA) -- A XINHUA editor's note says: To organize scientific and technical forces in tackling difficult problems in a coordinated manner in the face of important topics and weak links in the national economy and to rely on our own strength to realize the four modernizations program as soon as possible are the common aspirations of the party and all the people in the country. We are happy to see that the units concerned in the study and manufacture of large-scale integrated [LSI] circuts in China are being organized to tackle difficult problems in a coordinated manner and are scoring initial achievements.

To tackle difficult problems in the field of science and technology, we must have full national confidence. In other words, we must have faith in and rely on our own strength. After some strenuous efforts, we will certainly be able to solve the key problems in the development of China's national economy. Facts have proved that as long as we adopt firm policies and effective measures and bring into full play the role of exisiting technical forces and equipment, we will be able to make breakthroughs within a fairly short period. (end of editor's note)

In the past 3 years, the State Scientific and Technological Commission has organized several nationwide campaigns to tackle difficult problems in developing new technology for the manufacture of LSI circuits at a fast pace. Since the nationwide campaign to tackle problems in making LSI's in 1979, China has already succeeded in making more than 30 types of LSI's. The semiconductor research institute of the Chinese Academy of Sciences has succeeded in studying and making 16K dynamic memory chips. Qinghua University has succeeded in studying and making 8085-A monolithic 8-bit microprocessors and 4K static memory chips. Other units have succeeded in studying and making 1K and 4K memory chips as well as 8K read-only memory chips. They have also succeeded in studying and making two types of 8 monolithic 8-bit microprocessors and some peripheral circuits. All these achievements have passed inspection and will be put into full production in large quantities.

China's scientists and technicians have also made some new breakthroughs in the study of basic theories and new technology and techniques. Rapid progress has been made in the study of new technology and techniques such as designing software for computers and polishing without using abrasives. Some of the departments are carrying out experiments in applying and popularizing new technology and techniques so as to further develop the national economy.

HUBEI'S CHEN PIXIAN ATTENDS WORK CONFERENCE

HK040903 Wuhan Hubei Provincial Service in Mandarin 1100 GMT 1 Aug 82

The conference fully affirmed the achievements in work and the excellent situation in the first half of this year. Through earnestly studying and discussing the central leading comrades' instruction on the necessity of there being "four political guarantees for building a modern socialist state", the conference further enhanced ideological understanding of the necessity of "carrying out the construction of socialist material and spiritual civilization simultaneously," made a concrete analysis on the favorable and unfavorable conditions in the work in the second half year, studied measures for overcoming difficulties and promoting industrial and agricultural production, arranged to step up the struggle against serious crimes in the economic field, and made arrangements for structural reforms in the party and government organizations. In order to further develop industrial and agricultural production, problems in the field of circulation were particularly discussed and methods for resolving them were sought.

The conference analyzed the present situation and unanimously held: As in the whole country, the political and economic situation in our province is fairly good. Bumper harvests have been achieved in agricultural production and summer grain and oil crops, setting a new historical record. A bumper harvest of early rice is also imminent. On the basis of guaranteeing a yearly growth of 6 percent in industrial production, half of the whole year's task has been fulfilled in the first half of this year. Financial revenue is increasing. Revenue and expenditure are balanced and there is some surplus. The struggle against serious crime in the economic field of the province is going deeper and initial achievements have been scored. The drive of "five stresses and four beauties" is developing deeply and continuously in the whole province, especially in the cities. There is a good change in social order, popular style and party style.

The conference pointed out: While fully affirming the achievements in various work, we must realize that the tasks in the second half year are harder and there are many difficulties and we must do our utmost to work conscientiously. In the rural areas, it is necessary to further stabilize and perfect the responsibility systems in agricultural production and do a solid job in promoting all work there. In agricultural production, it is necessary for us to base our work on preventing floods, draining flooded fields and fighting against natural disasters to strive for more bumper harvests. In industrial production, it is necessary for us to firmly grasp the central link of raising economic returns and unify speed and returns so as to achieve the goal of fighting for a growth of 6 percent, and to strive for 7 percent to 8 percent, with better economic returns. Therefore, it is necessary for the industrial and commercial departments to work jointly in both increasing the manufacture and sales of products that meet the requirements of the market, and in vigorously expanding the products markets. It is necessary to firmly grasp the work of saving energy on the basis of tapping potentials and saving energy and resolve the problem of the short supply of energy.

It is necessary to straighten out the enterprises completely, especially in rectifying and building the leadership groups, and to strengthen ideological and political education for the staff and workers. In the work of finance and trade, it is necessary, on the premise of providing better service for industrial and agricultural production and for the people, to raise the economic returns of each department and unit, as well as those of the whole society, and improve the work of commodity circulation, thus promoting production and enlivening the market. It is necessary to firmly grasp the work of increasing production and practicing economy and increasing revenue and reducing expenditure so as to guarantee the overfulfillment of financial revenue for the whole year.

The conference stressed: It is necessary, while continuously hitting hard at the serious crimes in the economic field, to strengthen leadership and concentrate forces to uncover some large and important cases. It is necessary at the same time to conduct education for the vast number of cadres and masses in resisting corruption by capitalist ideology. It is necessary for the party organizations at various levels of the province to conduct education for the party members of the whole province in party spirit, party style and party discipline.

The conference laid stress on solving the problems in the field of commodity circulation in rural areas at present. It held that the main problems are:

1. Due to the underestimation and lack of preparedness for the profound changes in the countryside brought about by the extensive practice of economic responsibility systems in agricultural production, commercial work cannot adjust to the new situation.

For example, previously, the delivery and sales of major agricultural products such as grain, cotton and oil were conducted on a production team basis. These products were sold and accounts settled by each production team. But now, products are sold by each household and accounts settled by each production team, or products are sold and accounts settled by each household. The selling units have suddenly increased by several tens or even by hundreds of times. But the purchasing stations cannot increase much. In particular, there has been no prompt improvement in purchasing methods. As a result, in the peak purchasing season, the purchasing departments are very busy while the masses have to queue up to sell grain and cotton.

2. Some financial and trade business departments assign the contracts to the grassroots units with the purpose of improving management. Nevertheless new contradictions have arisen in handling the relationships between raising their own economic returns and serving the masses and production. Also, some improper methods are used for resolving these contradictions. For example, some grain departments in cotton-producing areas have stopped the handling of circulating grain in order to reduce losses. As a result, this has harmed the production capital circulation of the cotton peasants and the distribution of their grain ration.

3. In the relationship between manufacturing and sales of the diversified economy products, and in their processing, ideological understanding and practical work cannot keep up with the development of the diversified economy in the countryside. As a result, the problem of supply exceeding demand arose shortly after some diversified economy products started developing and there were the phenomena of limited purchasing and even stopping purchasing.

4. In the past 2 or 3 years, there have been many changes in the handling system and policies on agricultural and sideline products, causing phenomena of insufficient coordination and imperfections. Failure to resolve, in good time, the contradictions between the higher and lower levels and between one another at the same level has also harmed the circulation of commodities in the countryside.

5. The existing system of commodity circulation with division between urban and rural areas in our country was established under certain conditions in the early years of the founding of the PRC to suit the transformation of the system of private ownership. Now the situation is quite different. The circulation system with division between urban and rural areas no longer suits the requirements of development in industrial and agricultural production, and it must, under new circumstances, be changed to the principle of division into commodities and unified selling in urban and rural areas.

In resolving these problems, the conference first of all unified understanding regarding guiding ideology. Through studying and discussing the relevant instructions of the CPC Central Committee and the State Council, the attending comrades felt relatively deeply: We must treat the new situation and new problems in the field of circulation in the countryside with the ambitious spirit of conducting reforms. We must observe economic phenomena from correct viewpoints. First, we must realize that the basic situation of our country at present is a serious insufficiency of various raw materials of agricultural and sideline products. We absolutely cannot, because of a rapid and large increase in some raw material products in a short time resulting from the enthusiasm of the producers, demand the squeezing of production, stop procurement or enforce restricted procurement without making a concrete analysis.

The conference held: The industrial departments must vigorously expand processing capacities to meet the requirements of the people in consumed goods and to increase exports. Proceeding from this guiding idea, the conference further clarified the basic principles to be upheld in resolving concrete problems in the field of circulation in the countryside. 1) Any specific methods for resolving specific problems must be beneficial to promoting the development of diversified economy in the countryside, to the overall development of agricultural production and to the development of the whole national economy. 2) It is necessary to simultaneously care for the interests of the state, the collective and the individual laborers. All forms and methods of business operation, the procurement and sales bases for various agricultural and sideline products and the ratio between delivery and retention must all be decided according to this principle. All one-sided ideas and practices are improper. 3) It is necessary to adhere to the guiding principle of putting planned economy first and regulation by market mechanism second. It is necessary to guarantee the fulfillment of purchasing second category agricultural and sideline products on the part of the state and the task of delivery on the part of the peasants. As for the surplus after fulfilling the plan, producers must have their own decisionmaking power to handle it. It is particularly necessary to vigorously support the lower levels in developing processing industries with this portion of their products and engage in combined industry-agriculture-commerce operations. All the second category agricultural and sideline products produced this year must, in principle, be purchased and it is not permissible to restrict or stop the purchase of them. However, the development diversified economy products must be in harmony with the development of processing and purchasing capacities in industry and commerce. It is necessary to control next year's plan for products for which it is hard to expand the sales market in the near future. Some must be stabilized and some must be properly adjusted. 4) It is necessary to maintain the continuity and stability of policies. Whether in procurement and sales base figures, the ratio between delivery and retention, the method of contract work or other policy measures, there must be no repeated changes after decisions have been taken according to the above three requirements. Generally, they must be in force for 3 years. As for those products with a long cycle, the policies must be in force for 5 years. Only by so doing, can we reassure the people and benefit production.

Bringing democracy into full play and widely listening to the various suggestions, the conference studied and decided, according to the above basic principles, the methods for resolving some present problems in the field of circulation in the countryside which need urgent solving, including problems in grain procurement, delivery and sales contracts and financial contracts, in purchasing rapeseed and rapeseed oil and the expansion of supply, in purchasing and handling second category agricultural and sideline products, in arranging plans for several agricultural and sideline products, and in practicing an open system of commodity circulation in city and countryside.

The conference also demanded that after the meeting departments concerned must, according to the above basic principles, study methods to resolve the problems which could not be resolved at the meeting all at once.

All the attending comrades said that this meeting has done a good job in studying and solving the problem of commodity circulation in the countryside, and it will stimulate agricultural production, especially the development of the diversified economy.

The conference emphatically pointed out in conclusion: So long as the leaders of various levels have a clear understanding in guiding ideology, fully arouse the enthusiasm of the cadres and masses, are fully confident, humble and prudent, face the difficulties squarely and dare to overcome them, we will be able to victoriously fulfill all the work tasks for this year, score even greater new achievements in building socialist material and spiritual civilization and make more contributions to the motherland.

HUNAN HOLDS FORUM ON WORK TOWARD INTELLECTUALS

[Summary] The provincial CPC committee held a forum in Changsha 3-9 August on provincial work toward intellectuals. The meeting reviewed the state of affairs in the work toward intellectuals throughout the province, summed up and exchanged experiences, and studied the tasks ahead.

The meeting held: The CPC committees at all levels of our province have done a lot in the work toward intellectuals and have achieved certain results. But it must be seen that in order to give full play to the role of intellectuals it is still necessary to further eliminate the "leftist" influences, conquer prejudice against intellectuals and correct views toward them. It must be noted that radical changes have taken place in the rank of intellectuals. Of more than 310,000 technical personnel in our province, the middle-aged and young intellectuals account for 95 percent. The great majority of them have been fostered by the country since liberation. We must dare to give them a free hand in their work and exert efforts to educate and cultivate them so that they will become both socialist-minded and vocationally proficient.

Speaking of the tasks ahead in intellectual work, the meeting pointed out: It is necessary to handle properly some pending problems in implementing the policy on intellectuals. Importance must be attached to the work on nonparty member intellectuals. They must all be treated alike without discrimination and must be trusted. Leaders at all levels must participate in the work on intellectuals, making friends with them and listening to their opinions and suggestions. Attention must be given to helping intellectuals, especially the middle-aged, surmount the difficulties in their life. Their working and living conditions must, if possible, improve step by step.

The meeting called on CPC committees at various levels to study and adopt some practical measures to do better work on intellectuals in line with local conditions or respective districts and units in order to press forward our province's work on intellectuals with a big stride as a token in greeting the convocation of the 12th CPC Congress.

Secretaries Sun Guozhi and Zhao Chuqi of the provincial CPC committee and Ji Zhaoqing, standing committee member and director of the organization department of the provincial CPC committee, each spoke at the meeting.

[Text] Eastern and northwestern Sichuan were hit three times by torrential rainstorms in July, causing serious floods. In particular, the severity and extent of the floods in eastern Sichuan were unprecedented. Vice Governor Liu Haiquan, hearing of the serious disaster there, went with six others including provincial civil affairs department deputy director (Guo Peng) to Wanxian and other prefectures on 23 July to investigate the situation. He immediately telephoned the provincial government proposing vigorous support for the struggle against disaster in eastern Sichuan. The next day the provincial agricultural, water conservancy and electric power, and civil affairs departments and other departments sent four comfort groups to Dazian, Wanxian, Fuling and other disaster areas to comfort the stricken masses, find out the situation, and help the local authorities to carry out relief work.

On 6 and 9 August, the provincial CPC committee and government held three meetings of responsible comrades of the provincial organs to mobilize all departments to tap capital potentials and support Daxian, Wanxian, Fuling and other major disaster areas. They decided to allocate 20.5 million yuan in relief funds and various materials including chemical fertilizer, steel, cement, gasoline, diesel fuel and kerosene for flood-fighting there.

At the same time provincial CPC committee Executive Secretary Yang Rudai went to the disaster areas to comfort the people there and find out the situation. Provincial CPC committee Secretary He Haoju promptly reported the disaster situation to the Centeral Committee.

In accordance with the spirit of Comrade Tan Qilong's insttructions, the provincial CPC committee and government convened a further meeting of 114 responsible persons of departments and bureaus on 11 August to study disaster relief issues. They decided to allocate further sums and material to eastern Sichuan. They also organized a comfort work group. This group has already set out for the area.

SICHUAN RIBAO ON TRANSPROVINCIAL COOPERATION

HK131439 Chengdu Sichean Provincial Service in Mandarin 0030 GMT 11 Aug 82

[Text] Today SICHUAN RIBAO publishes a commentator's article in a prominent position on the front page. This article is entitled "Develop Transprovincial Economic and Technical Cooperation."

The article says that while our province has been vigorously enforcing the transformation and unification of industrial enterprises there has emerged a number of transprovincial and transmunicipal economic and technical integrated complexes. These integrated bodies, aiming at the improvement of economic returns, have broken the bounds of different regions. This form of cooperation is one with a bright prospect. Practice has shown that developing economic and technical cooperation with other provinces and municipalities, transplanting the good experiences of Shanghai and other coastal cities and provinces in our province and presenting our own experiences to other provinces are very advantageous to improving the quality of our province's products, developing new varieties, increasing economic returns and strengthening the cooperation between our province and other advanced provinces. Only by promoting transprovincial cooperation in line with the needs of economic construction and the demands of the market in urban and rural areas and according to the local conditions can we maintain close horizontal economic ties, eliminate the weaknesses and give full play to the strongpoints, give free reins to the superiority of each province and each municipality, and thus speed up exploring and making use of our province's rich mineral resources and agricultural and sideline products to develop precision processing and production of marketable goods. This is also a step of great significance to the rational readjustment of industral layout, to the cooperation between the hinterland and the coastal areas, and to their coordinated development.

The article points out: In developing transprovincial and transmunicipal economic and technical cooperation, we must adopt a long-term viewpoint and take the overall situation into consideration. Different parties engaged in cooperation must have their eyes on the overall situation, adhere to the principle of mutual benefit, fully consider the economic interests of every party involved, and should not spoil cooperation by being preoccupied with the gains and losses of one's own unit. Once the integrated complexes are well operated and economic returns are improved, we will be able to make greater contributions to the state, and all the parties within the integrated complexes will make more profits.

The article says that the leading departments concerned must conscientiously sum up experiences and carry out investigations and studies so as to promote transprovincial and transmunicipal economic and technical cooperation step by step and in a unified, coordinated and planned way. Those projects which have effect on the balance between supply, production and marketing in the whole province and in the whole country must be brought into line with the state plan, while other projects should be classified as [word indistinct] projects or local projects. All projects should be carried out in groups and by stages so as to avoid haphazardness.

XIZANG LEADER REVIEWS REGION'S ACHIEVEMENTS

[Text] Lhasa, August 12 (XINHUA) -- "An excellent situation rarely seen in the past 30 years or so has materialized in Tibet. It is characterized by political stability and a much better life of the people," said Ngapoi Ngawang Jigme, vice-chairman of the Standing Committee of the National Peoples' Congress and chairman of the Tibet Autonomous People' Government, in an interview with XINHUA.

Ngapoi attributed the success to the implementation of the new policies for Tibet adopted by the central government in 1980. He said in the unitary multination state of China, the Tibetan nationality has equal political status with other nationalities. Among the 19 vice chairmen of the N.P.C. Standing Committee are two Tibetans. A number of Tibetans have taken up leading posts in the party and state organs. "The party Central Committee and the State Council fully respect and listen attentively to the opinoins from us Tibetans when they discuss Tibetan questions or formulate policies for the region. I myself have attended such meetings on many occasions," he said.

The unity among the Tibetans, Hans and other minority nationalities such as Monba and Lhoba has been steadily strengthened. Local officials and masses are making concerted efforts to build a prosperous new Tibet, Ngaroi said.

He said in recent years Tibet has gained greater regional autonomy. More than 54 percent of the government officials are drawn from among the regions Tibetan and other minority nationalities. All of the Peoples' Congress standing committees are Tibetans.

The overwhelming majority of the government officials are new faces who have come to the fore since the 1959 democratic reform in Tibet. They understand the aspirations of the people and can listen carefully to their demands, he said.

He said "the government leaders are all elected by the masses. The Tibetans have never enjoyed such full rights as masters of their own region as today."

Ngapoi is gratified with the tremendous economic changes in the region in the past two years. "Since the adoption of the flexible policies in 1980, Tibet has reported rapid growths in agriculture and stockbreeding. The peoples living standards have improved markedly. In 1981, total output value of agriculture and stockbreeding was reached 487 million yuan, 19.5 percent more than 1979. Grain output was 483,500 tons, 60,500 tons more than 1979. Output of highland barley, a cereal all Tibetans like, came to 278,000 tons, 34.6 percent greater that the 1979 figure. Income from sideline occupations amounted to 42 million yuan, double the 1979 figure. The income of both peasants and herdsmen has increased with the development of production, exemption of taxes and the rise in state purchase prices of farm produce. The average per-capita income has risen from 127 yuan in 1979 to 200 yuan last year," he said.

Ngapoi said the Tibetans customs, habits and religious beliefs have been fully respected. Traditional culture has been restored and developed. "Everywhere I go, I see masses have ease of mind and are elated with joy," he said.

He cited many facts to show the kind attention and support given by the central government, provinces and municipalities throughout the country to promote economic and cultural development in Tibet.

Between 1980 and 1982 the region received 1.6 billion yuan in subsidies from the central government, accounting for 98 percent of the regions expenditure. Tibetan peasants and herdsmen enjoy free medical treatment, free film shows and free schooling for children.

"The fate of Tibet is closely linked with that of the motherland. Only in the big family of the motherland can our region have a bright future," he said. Ngapoi said the various policies adopted by the party in Tibet are suited to Tibet's conditions and conform with the interests and aspirations of the Tibetans and other minority nationalities. Only by further implementing these policies can Tibet become more and more prosperous and the masses enjoy a higher standard of living. A united, prosperous new Tibet will surely emerge on the "roof of the world."

YUNNAN CPC URGES IMPROVING FINANCIAL ENTERPRISES

[Summary] The provincial CPC committee and provincial financial and trade department recently called a joint meeting to exchange experiences in straightening out financial and trade enterprises in the province and perfecting economic responsibility systems. By summing up and exchanging experiences in these fields, the meeting put forward the following problems which need to be solved:

1) It is necessary to correct business ideas and stick to the socialist orientation. All financial and trade enterprises must earnestly carry out the principle of promoting the economy and ensuring supply. "Under the guidance of state plans, they must promote purchase and marketing, strengthen business accounting and improve service in order to better industrial and agricultural production, improve people's standard of living and accumulate more funds for the country." 2) In straightening out enterprises and perfecting economic responsibility systems, attaining better economic returns must be taken as the ultimate goal. 3) On the course of straightening out enterprises, it is necessary to do a good job in building leading bodies and the rank of workers and to make more perfect the regulations and systems of such enterprises. 4) It is also necessary to properly handle the relationship between material interests and political and ideological work. New ways must be explored for carrying out political and ideological work in the new situation. Our party's fine traditions in political and ideological work must be revived.

The meeting pointed out: The present straightening out of financial and trade enterprises is a comprehensive measure aimed at laying the foundation for building socialist modern enterprises. All units must tackle the problem in an all-round way and must not take any hasty actions or only make a token gesture..

On this issue, Yunnan Radio carried a commentary entitled "Sum Up Experiences, Do Well in Straightening Out Financial and Trade Enterprises and Perfecting Economic Responsibility Systems."

The commentary said: "By the end of June 1982, more than 4,700 financial and trade enterprises throughout the province had instituted economic responsibility systems, accounting for 84 percent of the total number of such enterprises. In early 1982, the provincial financial and trade departments also selected more than 800 financial and trade units to be straightened out on a trial base." Practice tells us that all our financial and trade enterprises must be straightened out and must practice economic responsibility systems. Otherwise, the socialist orientation of enterprises cannot be ensured, the enthusiasm of workers and staff cannot be aroused and better economic results cannot be attained.

However, leaders of some units lack understanding of the importance of developing the economic responsibility system and are afraid of the difficulties of straightening out enterprises. Thus, until now a small number of enterprises have not yet achieved the predicted better economic returns. The experiences gained from the recently-held meeting merit serving as references in straightening out enterprises and perfecting economic responsibility systems.

From the experiences, we find that there are the following three key points which will help us do a good job in straightening out enterprises: 1) Attention must be continuously paid to strengthening political and ideological work. 2) Attention is focused on arousing the the enthusiasm of leaders, workers and staff. 3) CPC committees should attach importance to giving effective leadership to the work of straightening out enterprises.

The commentary concluded: All enterprises can be successfully straightened out under the leadership of CPC committees and with the assistance of the departments in charge, provided we earnestly sum up our own experiences and learn from each other.

NEI MONGGOL URGES IDEOLOGICAL WORK ENHANCEMENT

SK070518 Hohhot Nei Monggol Regional Service in Mandarin 1100 GMT 6 Aug 82

[Excerpts] According to NEI MONGGOL RIBAO, the Nei Monggol Autonomous Regional CPC Committee recently sponsored a conference with the participation of party branch secretaries from the regional level organs to sum up experience gained in earnestly implementing the important directives issued by the CPC Central Committee in regard to the work of Nei Monggol over the past year and to review achievements scored in various fields. Meanwhile, the conference urged party organizations at all levels to strengthen ideological and political work and to heighten their work enthusiasm and exert all-out efforts to advance the excellent situation that has developed since the 3d Plenary Session of the 11th CPC Central Committee and to strive to score still greater achievements in various fields.

At the conference, Wang Duo, permanent secretary of the regional CPC committee, and (Qian Zhenyong), deputy secretary of the regional CPC committee, delivered important speeches on behalf of the regional CPC committee. The important directives issued by the CPC Central Committee in early August 1981 in regard to the work of Nei Monggol embody the spirit of the resolution adopted at the 6th Plenary Session of the 11th CPC Central Committee on certain questions in the history of our party since the PRC's founding. These directives represent the concern shown by the CPC Central Committee for the people of various nationalities in Nei Monggol and totally conform to the basic interest and desire of the people in the region, so that they are warmly supported by the cadres and masses of various nationalities throughout the region.

In implementing the important directives issued by the CPC Central Committee over the past year, the regional CPC committee has emphatically grasped the following work:

1. Efforts have been made to extensively and thoroughly disseminate the spirit of the central authorities' directives and publish and issue written materials for preaching these directives. Meetings and forums have been held for studying and discussing these directives. By making full preparations, a conference of party committee secretaries at county and banner levels has been held in which unified understanding toward the directives has been fostered and measures for implementing these directives have been worked out.

2. To better implement the principle of taking forestry and livestock as main tasks and developing a diversified economy, efforts have been made to sum up historical experience, particularly a lot of model experience gained in production, integrate these experiences with current tasks and hold various exhibits to fully prove the correctness of the production principle in line with theories and practice.

3. Efforts have been made to formulate a plan for restoring ecological balance and achieving the principle of regarding forestry and livestock as key tasks and developing a diversified economy and strive to realize a rational relationship among agriculture, forestry and livestock.

4. Efforts have been made to strengthen ideological and political work, launch criticism and self-criticism, combat weak and lax leadership in varying degrees, resolutely block the trend of bourgeois liberalism and wrong viewpoints that have cropped up from liberalism in regard to the theory of national affairs and continously bring order out of chaos.

5. Efforts have been made to strengthen the party's leadership and education on unity among nationalities and strive to persuade the broad masses of cadres and the people to clarify the party's fundamental task for the national affairs in the new historical period -- that all-out efforts should be made to develop the economy.

6. The provisions on population control have been recently issued in an effort to strengthen family planning work so as to control births and to strengthen population control to overcome problems associated with population migrations.

Through efforts to carry out this work, party organizations and the vast number of cadres and the people throughout the region have unswervingly implemented the important directives issued by the CCP Central Committee in regard to the work of Nei Monggol, resulting in consolidation and development of the excellent stable situation since the 3d Plenary Session of the 11th CPC Central Committee and the great unity among various nationalities. As a result, the region has made new progress in various economic construction this year and has created an excellent situation.

However, in implementing the important directives issued by the CPC Central Committee, there still is an ideological struggle. By correctly evaluating the situation and discerning the character and understanding the problems of this struggle in a timely manner, the regional CPC committee has been determined to adopt guiding measures and to patiently conduct much ideological and education work, as well as to resolutely expose and deal blows at a handful of bad elements who have persistently followed the reactionary doctrines of Lin Biao and the gang of four. These elements even spread rumors, slung mud, corrupted the minds of the people and flaunted the banner of issues on national affairs in an attempt to get rid of the CPC's leadership, deviate from the right path of socialism, create division among various nationalities and oppose the reunification of the motherland. All of their sabotaging activities have aroused the broad masses of cadres, party members and people of various nationalities throughout the region to great indignation. Historical experiences have again shown that anyone who runs against the interest and will of the vast number of people and goes against the trend of the times will be doomed to failure.

At the conference, participants from party organizations of the regional level organs held earnest discussions on important speeches given by Comrades Wang Duo and (Qian Zhenyong). Through study and discussions, the broad masses of cadres have upgraded their understanding of the directives. Many comrades stressed that the current CPC Central Committee is one of the leading cores in our party's history. They pledged to be firmly confident in the correct leadership of the CPC Central Committee and to conscientiously seek uniformity with the Central Committee in politics. The fundamental interst of the people of various nationalities is in maintaining great unity among the various peoples and the motherland's reunification. Some comrades stated: To implement the directives issued by the CPC Central Committee is a long-term strategic task. We should be sober enough to adopt a clear-cut stand of the party and the people and make due contributions to implementing the directives issued by the CPC Central Committee.

TIANJIN CPC URGES ENHANCEMENT OF POLITICAL WORK

[Excerpts] According to TIANJIN RIBAO, from 6 to 9 August the Tianjin Municipal CPC Committee sponsored a political and judicial work meeting at which participants earnestly studied and relayed the guidelines of the national political and judicial conference, defined the working orientation of political and judicial work in the new historical period and worked out principles and policies concerned. Bearing in mind the actual situation, they also formulated measures for implementing the spirit of the national political and judicial work conference.

Wu Zhen, deputy secretary of the municipal CPC committee, presided over the meeting. On behalf of the municipal CPC committee, Wang Enhui delivered a report on implementation of the national political and judicial conference's guidelines. (Zhang Zaiwang), permanent secretary of the municipal CPC committee, addressed the meeting.

In analyzing the municipal public security situation, the meeting contended that in recent years the municipal social order had become better and better and that the arrogance of criminals had been crushed, resulting in a great decline in criminal cases. The public security status in the busiest sections in the municipality has taken an obvious turn for the better and the masses in these sections have had a sense of security. More and more people in the municipality who dare to struggle against criminals have appeared.

The municipal public security status has not, however, taken a decisive turn for the better and serious and big criminal cases have still successively occurred. In the recent period, serious economic crimes such as smuggling, trafficking in contraband goods, taking bribes, profiteering and swindling and stealing state property continue to increase. There still are serious moral contamination and the social effects of that pollution in some corners and there still are prominent problems of the infiltration of bourgeois corrosive influences. All of this requires us to strengthen the political and judical work and not to be even slightly negligent.

The meeting noted: The basic purpose for conducting the political and judical work in the new historical period is to render service for the socialist economic foundation. In line with the four basic principles, it is necessary to enable the economy to play a vital role in protecting and promoting the program of achieving a socialist modernization.

The meeting pointed out: The first important task in conducting current political and judicial work is to resolutely deal blows to serious economic crimes. Continuous efforts should be made to upgrade understanding on this struggle, to define the focus of dealing blows to them and to grasp well the serious and major cases.

The second task in conducting current political and judical work is to exert all-out efforts consolidate public security in both urban and rural areas and vigorously to implement measures for carrying out public security consolidation in a comprehensive way.

The third task in conducting current political and judical work is to conduct extensive and pentrating education among the broad masses of cadres and the people in regard to socialism, patriotism and secret security to strictly keep the state secrets.

In conclusion the meeting noted: All departments and units in the municipality should closely cooperate with the political and judicial departments to do a good job in consolidating public security and strive to achieve a decisive turn for the better in the public security situation.

NINGXIA RIBAO URGES STRENGTHENING PLA, MILITIA

HK140306 Yinchuan NINGXIA RIBAO in Chinese 2 Aug 82 p 2

[Article by Ningxia Military District political department: "Carry Forward the Patriotic Spirit, Strengthen the Building of the PLA Units and Militia"]

[Text] The date 1 August 1927 marked the glorious birthday of the People's Army led by the CPC. For the past 55 years, by upholding the banner of Marxism-Leninism-Mao Zedong Thought, adhering to the aim of wholeheartedly serving the people and carrying forward the spirit of patriotism and revolutionary heroism, this army has been advancing wave upon wave for the sake of the Chinese people; it fought heroically and achieved great victories one after another. Today, while commemorating with full pride and enthusiasm "1 August," the glorious anniversary of the founding of the PLA, we should adhere to the four basic principles, carry forward the patriotic spirit and fight for building a strong revolutionary, modern and regular army.

Recently, while relaying the general political department's instruction on commemorating the 55th anniversary of the founding of the PLA, the party Central Committee urged conducting patriotic education for the army and people throughout the country, particularly for the youth, to love the CPC, the socialist motherland and the People's Army. This is essential and most opportune. This is an important question to be urgently resolved, particularly for the young people who were in the new society and have grown up under the red flag.

There is still a long way to go before we can heal the mental wounds of the 10 years' internal strife; capitalist ideology is corroding our body, and bourgeois liberalization and serious criminal activities in the economic field are very rampant in some areas. Those who lack national pride have blind faith in foreign things, always hold that the motherland is backward and inferior to Western "civilization" and "prosperity" and even bow and scrape and lose their national and personal nature. All this fully indicates that under the new historical conditions, it is very important to conduct patriotic education for people and the army throughout the country, particularly for the young people, in order to strengthen their national and personal pride. Our army is a new type of people's armed force. From the first day of its founding, it has been put under the absolute leadership of the party and has become deeply rooted in the masses of people. This People's Army could not have been built without the CPC and it could not have been developed and become strong without the full support and aid of the masses of people. We love our great motherland, our great people and especially our great party. Only under the leadership of the party is it possible to enhance the people's patriotic spirit and to realize the lofty ideal of the people who fought for the motherland in our national history.

Patriotism constitutes a priceless spiritual treasure of the Chinese people. If we open the annals of the party's history, we can observe that Mao Zedong, Liu Shaoqi, Zhou Enlai, Zhu De, Dong Biwu, Peng Dehuai, He Long, Chen Yi and other proletarian revolutionaries of the old generation as well as the heroes from the national liberation war and in the defense of the homeland and border area are all most outstanding and exemplary representatives of national patriots. All of their spendid heroic merits can be recorded in our annals. Their noble quality to serve the country and the people will always encourage us to continue fighting to make the country strong and prosperous and to make the people happy.

We, people of all nationalities in Ningxia, also possess glorious patriotic tradition. During the period of the second revolutionary civil war, the masses of people under the party in the Shaanxi-Gansu-Ningxia border area actively joined the army, and collected money and foodstuffs to support the troops at the front. During the war against Japanese aggression, the people of all nationalities in Ningxia made great contributions to the national liberation war victory.

During the liberation war, the Han and Hui people coordinated their activities with the liberation army to eliminate the reactionary troops of Hu Zongnan and Ma Hungkui.

Now our socialist motherland is living in a new era of historical development. All the commanders and fighters as well as the militia throughout the district must actively respond to the party Central Committee's call to carry forward with patriotic spirit and to make new contributions in building and defending the four modernizations.

We must persist in adhering to the four basic principles, carrying forward the revolutionary tradition and always bear in mind our aim to wholeheartedly serve the people in order to develop and strengthen army and militia building and to make ideological and material preparations against a war of aggression. All units must consolidate and expand the fruits of victory in the education of loving the motherland and consolidate and expand the northwest to oppose corrosion. Militia organizations at all levels must conduct education in loving the party, the motherland, the socialist system and the People's Army. Through this education, it is necessary to arouse the patriotic enthusiasm of the militia, to strengthen their faith in communism and firm belief in the party's correct leadership, and to apply the revolutionary drive derived from the education to various tasks such as production, patrolling and training.

To create a socialist spiritual civilization is an important guarantee for building a strong socialist country and a modernized and regularized revolutionary army. We must carry out the activities in the army, such as "to help armymen have lofty ideas, good morality, knowledge and good health; stress the army's standards of appearance and bearing, good manners and good discipline; and fear neither hardship nor bloodshed nor sacrifice," so that the cadres, fighters and militia will possess ideals, morality and culture and observe discipline.

Army-government and army-people unity is the important guarantee for our victory. Party organizations at all levels, the government and all nationalities in our region attach great importance and affection for the army, which is made up of the sons of the people. They are always eager to meet the needs of the units, help the army obtain what it needs, and give full support for army building. In the past few years, closer relations between the army and government and the army and people have been established and their unity has been strengthened. We must carry on the glorious tradition of supporting the government and cherishing the people. Under the unified leadership of the local party committees, together with the masses of people, we must build Ningxia into an unbreakable antihegemonic fortress. By strengthening the army building itself, all army units must make efforts and help the places where troops are stationed to build socialist spiritual civilization. They should frequently solicit the opinions of the local government and people about the army and sincerely accept their criticism. It is necessary to frequently educate the cadres and fighters to remember the aim of the army, to respect the government, to take good care of the people, to carry out the policies, laws and decrees of the party and government in an exemplary way, to strictly adhere to mass discipline, to support local socialist construction within their power and to help the masses develop public welfare. It is necessary to conscientiously carry out the party policy towards nationalities and do more favorable work for the unity of nationalities.

Let us unite under the banner of patriotism, further carry on the glorious tradition of the People's Army, and remember the mission and responsibility of the army. Under the leadership of the party Central Committee and central military commission, let us exert ourselves in the building of a powerful socialist country and a powerful revolutionary, modern and regular army.

CHIANG REAFFIRMS REFUSAL TO TALK WITH PRC

[Text] Taipei, 10 Aug (CNA) -- The preparatory committee for the 1982 national development seminar held its last meeting on the afternoon of 9 August to review and sum up the conduct of this year's seminar. The meeting unanimously held that President Chiang Ching-Kuo's speech at his meeting with the general leader, deputy general leaders, panel leaders and deputy panel leaders of the current national development seminar on 22 July was very important and decided to have the full text published. The following is President Chiang's speech entitled "Politics, Culture, Economic Affairs, Science and Technology."

The most significant purpose of the national development seminar is to promote an exchange of views and interflow of wisdom among scholars at home and abroad and thereby to establish a common understanding of the national development program, strengthen their unity, contribute their efforts and push various national development projects continuously forward. Therefore, the national development seminar each year not only provides a place for scholars at home and abroad to exchange views, learn from one another and dedicate their knowledge to the country, but serves as a channel for them to maintain friendly contacts. I think the seminar is indeed of great value and has accomplished a great deal. I have just heard the initial concluding reports by the leaders of the four panels on politics and foreign affairs, culture and education, economic affairs and science and technology and have learned that, as in past years, the national development seminar has achieved many results this year. Now, I would like to put forward some of my personal views on these four topics.

First, politics. At present, our basic national policy is to defeat the Communists and pursue the task of national recovery and to implement the three principles of the people. However, this national policy is not one which has just been formulated today, but a basic policy since the founding of the Republic of China to devote ourselves to the cause of the three principles of the people and to fight for them unremittingly. From overthrowing the Ching Dynasty to defeating the warlords, the war of resistance against Japan, the war to suppress the bandits and put down the rebellion and today's struggle to defeat the communists and pursue the task of national recovery, all our sacrifices and efforts have, without exception, been made for the one purpose of removing obstructions to the implementation of the three principles of the people. Although there have been violent storms, in the end all enemies are defeated by these principles. Therefore, our policy of building the state with the three principles will never change. At the same time we also believe that the great cause of suppressing the Communists and recovering the mainland will certainly win final victory by adhering to this policy.

In retrospect, during the period from the northern expedition and unification in 1928 to the beginning of the war of resistance against Japan, the government had completed many major national development projects according to the national construction guidelines of the three principles of the people, and the Republic of China had made remarkably rapid progress. It was exactly because of this, the Japanese warlords, fearing China's growing power, launched an all-out war of aggression against China in 1937. We were determined to fight till the end to defend our national freedom and independence. Following victory over Japan, we promptly convened the National Assembly, promulgated the Constitution and implemented democracy and constitutional government, thus realizing the principle of democracy. It was most painful to note that the Communist bandits launched an all-out rebellion and unjustly occupied the mainland. As a result, our hundreds of millions of compatriots are living in destitution, and our beautiful land has been turned into a scene of devastation everywhere by Marxism-Leninism.

Therefore, as long as the Communist tyranny remains, our job is not done. Now the achievements made by the government and the prosperity in the bastion of national recovery have fully demonstrated the superiority of the three principles of the people. They have also strengthened our belief. For 71 years, because we have always adhered to our established national policy, our country has stood firm and erect in storms and waves. To recover our mainland territory in the future, we must still rely only on the three principles of the people.

Chinese Communists have perceived that Marxism-Leninism is bound to fail and that the dictatorship of the proletariat is bound to collapse. This is why they are playing the same old trick in an attempt to improve their lot with the cunning scheme of "peace talks" and "reunification." However, everyone should always keep firmly in mind that "negotiation" is a reasonable way to solve problems in the free world, but it is another type of war for the Communists. In other words, when the Communists cannot achieve their ends by force on the battlefield, they pretend to seek peace and try to achieve their ends through negotiation. We have the deepest and most painful experience of this. There were many causes for the fall of the Chinese mainland, but one of the principal causes was that a few politicians and Communist fellow travelers organized groups to hold "peace talks" with the Communists in Peiping. These "peace talks" first of all caused differences of pinion within our own ranks, confused friend with foe and caused the nation to forfeit its central objective. As a result, the nation lost its willpower and strength. Now the Chinese Communists have put forward the so-called "nine-point" proposal and have been clamoring for "peace talks." Just think: The Chinese Communists first wanted to plugne Taiwan in a bloodbath; after they were defeated in the Kuningtou battle and the 23 August artillery battle, they then took the measure of "shelling Quemoy on odd days and not shelling on even days," indicating that they remained in a state of war with us. Then, the Chinese Communists became weaker and weaker with each passing day, because of the turmoil caused by the "Great Cultural Revolution," while our national strength was getting stronger and stronger. It was at that time that the Chinese Communists put forward slogans calling people to "return to the motherland" and "identify themselves with the motherland." But the result was that compatriots at home and abroad "returned" to free China and "identified themselves" with the three principles of the people. Now, the Chinese Communists are harping on the same old string of "peace talks." However, their basic aim has remained unchanged -- to seize Taiwan and put the Taiwan compatriots under their Communist rule. Therefore, we refuse to negotiate with the Chinese Communists or to have any contact with them, so that their cunning scheme cannot succeed. Thi is not a sign of retreat, much less of fear. On the contrary, it is the Chinese Communists who are afraid of having their negotiation conspirary rejected. Therefore, our exposure of the Chinese Communists' evil plot is not a passive but a positive measure, a most powerful counterblow to their united front tactics. With our firm stand and growth in stength, we can cause confusion and division among the Chinese Communists themselves and arouse the compatriots on the mainland to resist their despotic rule in an all-round way -- this is the most effective offensive against their united front tactics.

Internationally, some people may not quite understand our firm stand. They think that our policy is too rigid and that we are too stubborn. They are not sympathetic to our stand. This is because they do not know that the morale of our army and people would start collapsing the moment the government toyed with the idea of talking with the Chinese Communists. Then, overseas Chinese would begin to doubt the government's anticommunist policy, their centripetal force would begin to decline and the compatriots on the mainland would give up their hope of regaining their freedom.

Then, the Chinese Communists would be able to achieve their united front objectives. Under no circumstances must we ever toy with such an idea. Therefore, our basic stand will never change, no matter how others may criticize us. After all, which is more important -- our own survival or others' sympathy with us? This is a question that calls for no answer. Under the guidance of this general principle, our policy of national recovery and construction is that we will do with all our strength whatever can improve the well-being of the people. On the contrary, we will never do anything harmful to the future of the nation and the well-being of the people.

Second, let us deal with education and culture. The educational policy of the Republic of China has two objectives: one is universalization and the other equality. It can be said now that both objectives have been achieved. By saying so, I do not mean that there are no defects in our education. In fact, there is much room for improvement. As far as universal education is concerned, the school attendance rate for school-age children is now more than 99 percent, and there is almost no illiteracy. As for equality in education, children of any family, regardless of their parents' occupation and social status and with the determination to make progress, enjoy absolutely equal opportunities to receive various types of education under fair competition. This is why students of our institutions of higher learning and graduate schools and those studying abroad have various family backgrounds and different experiences in life. This fully shows that all our young people enjoy equal opportunities to receive education. In addition to school education, social and family education, of course, are also very important and should be coordinated with school education. Only thus can we guide young people to be good citizens. Now people think that the general mood of society is not so good. Juvenile delinquency is not infrequent. This shows that it is necessary for us to study and solve such problems and improve our educational work. We should try to understand young people's ideas and problems, give them sympathic guidance and help them solve their problems. People can become good citizens only through good education. Only with good citizens can there be a wholesome society. We should work harder for this.

In culture, the Chinese Communists have been frenziedly destroying our national culture and replacing it with Marxism-Leninism, while we have done everything we can to preserve the culture of the Chinese nation. We are determined, not only to have the culture of the Chinese nation take root and develop on this bastion for national rejuvenation but, more important, to achieve the objectives of national recovery and construction by developing our national culture. We profoundly realize that education and culture of the Chinese nation, which is of long standing and well established, can never be replaced by foreign Marxism-Leninism. We are also firmly convinced that the comprehensive and profound culture of the Chinese nation and our educational policy on the basis of benevolence are where our strength for opposition to Communism and for national economy lies.

Next, let us discuss the economy. Everyone says that our economic achievements are quite remarkable. The achievements are apparent in the people's well-fed and well-clothed appearance. Of course, we are still facing challenges in economic development at higher levels. However, we have followed our national father's [Sun Yat-sen] principle of social well-being as the supreme guidance for our economic construction from beginning to end. Because we are taking a correct road, all our policies and measures can promote good coordination between government-operated and private enterprises, develop agriculture, industry and commerce in proper order, constantly increase the people's income, gradually narrow the difference in people's incomes and steadily make us advance toward the ideal goal of "everyone is rich."

Therefore, we have fortunately laid a sound foundation for our economic construction. If we continue to orientate our efforts in this direction, we will surely make still greater developments.

There are many schools of economic doctrine and theory and each has its theoretical basis. But I do not think it is possible to solve all economic problems by theory alone. The important thing is that the economic policy we choose to implement must comply with the condition of the country and conform to the people's interests. The government is responsible to the people for any measures it adopts. Therefore, it must overally consider the advantages and disadvantages of a measure to prevent it from causing any loss to the people. Whatever conforms to the people's interests also conforms to the national interests as a whole. Take the question of whether we should give higher priority to growth or to stability -- a question which was a recent lively topic of discussion -- for instance. I think that both should be treated as equally important. In practice, we should coordinate properly, according to circumstances, so that a steady national economic growth will yield its greatest advantages while having the least adverse effects on the people's livelihood.

Last, on science and technology. In order to make our national construction continue to advance toward modernization, it is indeed a task of top priority to absorb, import and transfer new scientific and technological knowledge and make it take root in our country. Our government is adopting various measures to encourage scientific and technological developments, but it is the most important to train, reward and promote talented persons. Many of you present at this meeting are scientists or engineering experts, with specialized knowledge and accomplishment abroad. I hope that scholars residing in foreign countries, like you, constantly return home to direct scientific and technological research at home and accelerate the development of national construction.

We have formulated a plan for turning our country into a developed country in the 1980's. The scientific and technological development is the key to the success of this plan. Therefore, we must pool the wisdom of the academic circles at home and abroad, industrial circles and the national defense department, make joint efforts to create new things and work for perfection and progress.

Since its inception, the national development seminar has made great contributions every year. This is because we are working with one heart in a free and democratic society and pooling our wisdom for national prosperity and the people's well-being. We are unlike the Chinese Communists who, engaged in waging struggles, destroying culture and persecuting talented persons all day long, have made the China mainland poor and barren. In contrast, we are like a brillant and hard diamond, while the Chinese Communists are like a heap of rotten scrap iron. Therefore, we have full confidence in the great cause of opposing communism and recovering the mainland. We will finally succeed and win.

SUN YUN-HSUAN VISITS OFF-SHORE ISLANDS

[Text] Kinmen, Aug. 16 (CNA) -- Premier Sun Yun-hsuan flew to Kinmen last Friday and conveyed President Chiang Ching-kuo's regards to the armed forces stationed there. In the company of Hau Pei-tsun, chief of the general staff and commander on Kinmen, Premier Sun also inspected the front line satellite isles including Ta An and Erh Tan. At a breakfast meeting with officers and cadres in Kinmen last Saturday morning, Premier Sun said the communist regime has launched a "peace offensive" against the nation in order to destroy the unity and safety of the people in Taiwan. He urged the officers and soldiers there to keep alert against the communist united front plot and repel Red China's invasion. Premier Sun visited a fishery laboratory, a farm products laboratory and an expanded power plant in Kinmen. After leaving Kinmen, [the] premier flew to the Penghu Islands to inspect the defense and cultural development there. In the company of magistrate Hsieh You-wen of Penghu County, the premier called at the newly completed cultural center.

PAPER ON BEIJING 'SILENCE' ON U.S. ARMS STANCE

[Editorial: "Peiping's Strange Silence"]

[Text] U.S. President Reagan's announcement that the United States will continue its military aid to the Republic of China was greeted with stony silence in Peiping. In the past, Communist China had protested violently. Sources in Washington revealed that President Reagan hoped the United States and Red China would issue a joint communique explaining the level of American assistance would not increase either in quality or quantity. The New York TIMES reported Peiping refused to issue such a communique.

If Mr. Reagan is seeking to keep the communists off balance, he is succeeding. Peiping in the past has protested strenuously to the continuation of arms sales to the Republic of China. Peiping insists Taiwan is a province of the communist "government" and regards Taiwan as its "territory."

In his attempt to spread confusion on the mainland Mr. Reagan hinted that U.S. military aid to Taiwan might be suspended in the future. Perhaps this is why Peiping has chosen to remain silent. However, if this is Reagan's intent, it will be thwarted by U.S. Senator Barry Godlwater and other senators friendly to the Republic of China. Senator Goldwater recently told Reagan that if assistance to Taiwan is cut off, the President will face a stiff fight in the U.S. Senate.

Our own interpretation of this flurry of press reports is that there is no doubt that the Republic of China will continue to receive American assistance for as long as it is needed. The fact is that Communist China's position continues to deteriorate as people in more and more of the mainland provinces continue to increase their opposition to Peiping.

It may well be that this is President Reagan's thinking as well. The new U.S. foreign secretary is well versed in the situation and is known to be friendly to the Republic of China. He is as well a good friend of Saudi Arabia, which is a true friend of the Republic of China.

In Taipei, Liu Ta-jen, the Foreign Ministry spokesman, said the government is more confused than concerned. He explained, "It is not out policy to comment on such an important issue on the basis of press reports that appear to be of a speculative and contradictory nature."

In one of America's national elections a favorite quotation was, "God, am I confused." It can be applied to Communist China now.

INCREASED TRADE SOUGHT WITH OTHER NATIONS

Chu Fu-sung Speech

OW130444 Taipei CNA in English 0320 GMT 13 Aug 82

[Text] Taipei, Aug. 13 (CNA) -- Foreign Minister Chu Fu-sung Thursday stressed the importance of developing substantive relations with countries having no diplomatic ties with the government here. Speaking at the 61st session of the Committee on Constitutional Research of the National Assembly, Chu said the government should actively take part in international conferences and activities, enhance international cultural interchanges and exchange visits.

"Substantive external relations help expand our trade, develop and advance industry and technology," Chu indicated, adding they ensure the status of this country in the world.

"By attending international meetings and activities, the government is able to build up its image to the other countries, and can in many ways help protect the nation's interests," Chu pointed out.

He commented that Peiping's recent offer of the so-called peaceful unification is another round of its united front tactics, aiming to stop the United States from selling advanced and sophisticated weapons to the ROC [Republic of China], disintegrate the relations of the ROC and other countries, and isolate the country from the world.

By repeatedly claiming that they are willing to have peaceful unification with the government here but are rejected in this effort, the Chinese Communists have created an erroneous image of the Republic of China in the world. Chu asserted it is important to strengthen the nation's substantive relations with other countries and build up the image of the ROC. He reiterated the basic national policy of not coming to terms with the Communists. The meeting was opened in Taipei Thursday by Dr. Ku Cheng-kang, deputy director of the Committee on Constitutional Research.

Netherlands Trade Growing

OW111305 Taipei CHINA POST in English 8 Aug 82 p 8

[Text] According to official figures compiled by the government here, trade with the Netherlands is booming in spite of efforts by the Communist regime on mainland China to squelch relations between the Republic of China and European nations. Official figures show that the two-way trade between the Republic of China and Holland for the first half of 1982 totalled US $236 million, placing the Netherlands fourth in importance as a European trading partner with the ROC after W. Germany, England and France.

The Euro-Asia trade organization has revealed that the outlook for trade between the Republic of China and the Netherlands is very good and that a team of ROC businessmen will visit the Netherlands in the near future to further cement economic ties between the two nations.

Submarine Sale to ROC

Economic ties between the Republic of China and the Netherlands were believed to have been dealt a serious blow with the refusal of the Chinese Communist regime to ratify a cultural treaty with the Netherlands in relation for Holland's acceptance of an order from the ROC for two submarines. The Dutch Government has agreed to fulfill the order in spite of the Communist regime's opposition. In addition, the Communist Chinese have also refused to ratify a treaty on economic and technical relations. Both treaties were signed during a visit to the mainland by a Dutch official, but have been laid aside due to the submarines sale.

Dutch-ROC Ties Growing

Disregarding the Communists' objections, the Dutch Government has continued to allow economic ties between the Netherlands and the ROC to grow in an atmosphere of mutual goodwill.

One indication of this attitude is the agreement on the part of one Dutch company operating in the ROC, Philips Electronics Inudstries (Taiwan) Ltd., to provide highly technical software here, as well as to proceed with the training of technicians in the Republic of China.

ISSUE OF PRC-U.S. CULTURAL EXCHANGES DISCUSSED

[Editorial: "The Disappearance of Hu Na and Sino-American Cultural Exchanges"]

[Text] Chinese tennis player Hu Na was sent to Mexico last year to take part in a tournament in which she succeeded in winning the Casablanca Cup. At the invitation of the U.S. Tennis Association, she went to Santa Clara, California in July this year to take part in the Association Cup tennis tournament. She suddenly disappeared a few days later.

The incident occurred at a time when Sino-American relations were steadily deteriorating. The Reagan administration insisted on the sale of weapons to Taiwan and refused to set a time limit for this. China has issued statements and lodged protests, pointing out that this constituted an interference in China's internal affairs and that if the United States should cling obstinately to its course, Sino-American relations would suffer a retrogression. It was at this moment that the incident of Hu Na's disappearance in the United States occurred. This hasdeepened the rift in the Sino-American relations. On the other hand, a number of U.S. senators took advantage of this opportunity to make a great issue of it. They filed a draft joint resolution demanding that Hu Na be granted political asylum. Taiwan coordinated on the issue from afar by welcoming Hu Na to "settle down in Taiwan." The United States and Taiwan were putting on a two-man act. The spoken parts of the act were to the effect that China was undemocratic and that it practiced political persecution so that Hu Na had to seek political asylum and so on.

Did Hu Na seek political asylum of her own free will? What was the actual state of affairs? We are unable to find out how the matter stands. From the various conjectures about the "disappearance" revealed by the news broadcasts in both the United States and Taiwan, it is clear that some people were engaged in mischief behind the scenes. However, it is absolutely true that Hu Na has never suffered "political persecution." Hu Na seeking political asylum in order to escape political persecution is an argument which does not hold water.

Hu Na went to the United States at the invitation of the U.S. Tennis Association. Some people said that the Tennis Association is a nongovernmental organization, which means that the U.S. Government has no responsibility to protect her safety. This was a preposterous argument. Hu Na's trip to the United States was arranged in accordance with the agreement on Sino-American cultural exchange. The U.S. Government has the duty to ensure her safety, whether the invitation came from a governmental or nongovernmental organization. Since it accepted her arrival, it should also ensure her return. Otherwise, how can the two countries promote mutual cultural and sports exchanges? China cannot help but be doubtful as to whether the United States issued the invitation with ulterior motives to let some sneaky fellows in the CIA give full play to their skill.

The Chinese Government is unequivocal in its attitude. A Foreign Ministry spokesman pointed out that "the U.S. side must be responsible for the personal safety of the Chinese tennis players and, at the same time, send Hu Na back to China." China's ambassador to the United States, Chai Zemin, also told reporters: "We hold that the United States should find her as quickly as possible and then send her back to China." Otherwise, the cultural exchanges between China and the United States will be greatly affected. It is said that the U.S. State Department is reviewing the case. It is hoped that it will seriously consider the Chinese Government's stand and will not undermine the cultural exchanges between China and the United States on account of Hu Na. The question is whether to continue fabricating the incident of Hu Na's disappearance and sabotaging Sino-American cultural exchanges on the pretext of granting her "political asylum," or to abide by the agreement on cultural exchanges by ending this ugly act and sending Hu Na back. This is a decision that the U.S. State Department should make with circumspection.

TA KUNG PAO ON U.S.-JAPAN MILITARY RELATIONSHIP

["Newsletter From Japan" by Chang Cheng-chien [1728 2052 0467]: "Readjustments in Japanese-U.S. Military Relationship"]

[Text] The U.S. global strategy is to maintain strategic superiority in Europe, keep a strong counterforce in the Middle East and reduce its military presence in Asia. The strategic guideline for Asia for the next 5 years put forth by Reagan after assuming office calls for greater U.S. emphasis on Southeast Asia. "The supreme goal in northeast Asia and the Pacific is to join the friendly countries and allies in these areas in preventing the expansion of the influence of the Soviet Union and Vietnam." Therefore, "Japan must considerably increase its defense strength, so that the Japanese-U.S. military relationship can be turned into that of active defense partners." Strategically speaking, Japan and the United States are in agreement. However, in concrete terms, there is still a gap between Japan and the United States. This gap has been increasingly widening.

A Gap in the Understanding of the Soviet Union

The United States holds that the military balance between the United States and the Soviet Union has undergone changes in the past 10 years. The balance has tilted in favor of the Soviet Union. Since the Soviet Union sent troops into Afghanistan, Western countries have failed to come up with effective countermeasures. Now, the Soviet Union has acquired the military strength to embark upon still greater adventures. As the Soviet Union faces many difficulties at home and in Eastern Europe, it may in the future use military means to further carry out external expansion. The United States has sensed the Soviet threat most seriously.

Japan considers that there is basically a military balance between the United States and the Soviet Union in the Pacific area. It still cannot be said that the situation is in favor of the Soviet Union. Because the Soviet Union itself has great weaknesses and also because its regular forces are directed mainly at China, at present it still cannot immediately pose a serious military threat to Japan. Based on such understanding, Japan has consistently failed to satisfy U.S. demands in regard to the scale and pace of military expansion. Besides, Japan is restricted by Article 9 in its Constitution and the three nonnuclear principles. Public opinion at home and abroad also opposes the conversion of Japan into a military power. For these and other reasons, Japan does not dare to openly accept the U.S. demand.

From the Japanese-U.S. military talks in Hawaii in June last year to U.S. Secretary of Defense Weinberger's visit to Japan in March this year, Japan and the United States on many occasions exchanged opinions and readjusted their differences in their understanding of the Soviet Union.

The New "Intermediate Professional Estimate" Is a Product of Readjustment

The Japanese Defense Agency approved on 23 July the "Intermediate Professional Estimate" for 1983-87. This shows that there has been great progress in the readjustment of opinions between Japan and the United States in the military field. For example, in 5 years, a military outlay of 4.4 trillion to 4.6 trillion yen will be devoted to increasing military equipment, with an emphasis on greater naval and air force strength. The generals of the Defense Agency said: "As far as the immediately available equipment of the land, sea and air forces in proper proportions is concerned, Japan will have strength second only to that of the superpowers and Britain and France."

The air force will add 75 high-performance F-15 fighters in 5 years to the existing number of planes, raising the total to 155. Some of them will be assigned to Iwo Jima to counter the Soviet Backfire tactical bomber.

Thus, the Japanese air force will team up with the U.S. Air Force stationed in Japan, not only undertaking anti-Soviet air defense assignments on Japan's islands, but also playing the role of intercepting Soviet Backfire tactical bombers intruding into Pacific airspace.

As far as antisubmarine planes are concerned, 50 P-3C's will be added in 5 years to the existing number of aircraft, making a total of 75. Thus, in number of P-3C planes owned among Western countries, Japan will rank second after the United States. The performance of the P-3C is two or three times better than that of the P-2J version which represents the core of Japan's current fleet of antisubmarine planes. Given an additional supply of 60 escort vessels (40 armed with guided missiles) and 15 submarines, Japan can cope with Soviet submarines in the northwest Pacific to a certain degree, making up for the U.S. deficiency in antisubmarine capability in this region.

In a speech at a press conference after his Washington talks with President Reagan in May last year, Prime Minister Zenko Suzuki said: "Japan must defend its 1,000-nautical-mile sealane." Immediately after his speech, U.S. Secretary of Defense Weinberger, putting forth his demand, said: "I understand that the speech by Prime Minister Suzuki is a pledge to the American people. It is hoped that he will keep it without fail. It is also hoped that the defense of the sealanes will be extended to north of the Philippines and west of Guam Island." Later, in the Hawaii talks in June last year, the U.S. side again put forward a concrete demand to the Japanese side. It was demanded that Japan, in 5 years, increase the number of escort vessels to 70, submarines to 25, F-15's to 200 and P-3C's to 125. The U.S. plan is that, in case of trouble in Europe or the Middle East, the 7th Fleet and 5th Fleet Air Forces, the main U.S. force in the Far East, will be transferred to the Indian Ocean or the Persian Gulf. At that time, military strength in the Western Pacific will inevitably be greatly reduced. Japan must strengthen its naval and air forces "as quickly as possible and to a maximum extent," enabling the United States to be able to transfer with "ease of mind" its main Far East force to the major battlefield. The joint five-nation exercise in the Pacific in which Japan participated not long ago was based on the assumption that the Japanese Self-Defense Forces at sea would carry out some of the fighting assignments of the 7th Fleet. This means that Japan's military strength is taken into account in the U.S. strategy for Asia. The "Intermediate Professional Estimate" has obviously represented a big step forward in meeting the U.S. strategic demand.

The U.S. attitude is that it will not only make a positive assessment of the "Intermediate Professional Estimate," but also convey the idea that the estimate "still falls short of meeting its demand." The day the new "Intermediate Professional Estimate" was approved by the Japanese Defense Agency, the U.S. Department of Defense published a report on "the contributions to joint defense by the allies" NATO and Japan, pointing out that although already an economic power, Japan made the least contribution among 15 Western allies in its share of the defense effort. The Japanese and the U.S. authorities will again meet in Hawaii in the second part of August this year. It is expected that there will be new progress in military cooperation between Japan and the United States.

Japan Has Its Own Plans

The readjustment of the Japanese-U.S. relationship will be easier in the military field than in the economic field. Why? Historically speaking, Japan, since the Meiji restoration, has on the one hand contended for hegemony with Britain, the United States and other powers in the name of "Asia being for Asians." On the other hand, it has relied on its alliance with certain imperialist countries to realize its ambition to invade small nations to assert its dominant role in Asia. The seeds of this strategy of the Japanese ruling group did not die with Japan's defeat in World War II. These seeds have all along remained in the minds of the ruling group. Before the 1980's, an ideal climate and soil did not exist for such a strategy.

Until a few years ago, Dr Kissinger worried about Japan. The United States had consistently restricted the reorganization of Japan's naval and air forces for fear that Japan would again use its military strength to contend for spheres of influence. Now, the situation has changed. The United States needs Japan's naval and air force strength to make up for the deficiency in its global strategy, thus holding out to Japan the possibility of sending troops out of its country. Therefore, concerning the U.S. demand for increased military strength, Japan does not dare to seek military expansion with great fanfare, because of the opposition of public opinion at home and abroad. But deep down, Japan sees an opportunity to stage a comeback. Japan is provided with the necessary conditions to replace part of the U.S. role in Asia through its military cooperation with the United States -- to realize its ambition to reassert its dominant role in Southeast Asia by relying on a Japanese-U.S. alliance. Of course, Japan is relatively cunning in its approach. It gives the appearance of "expanding the army under the pressure of the United States." In fact, it has made a two-pronged effort to step up preparations in regard to both public opinion and military matters. The Education Ministry's embellishment of militarism and distortion of the history of aggression is only part of the effort to prepare public opinion. Asians can never be indifferent to the readjustments in the Japanese-U.S. military relationship. While noting that these relations play a part in fighting Soviet hegemonism, we must also take note of the beginnings of a desire on Japan's part to take advantage of this opportunity to stage a comeback.

CHIANG CHING-KUO REJECTS TALKS 'OUT OF FEAR'

["Political Talk" column by Shih Chun-yu [2457 0689 3769]: "Chiang Ching-kuo Rejects Peace Talks Out of Fear"]

[Text] The Difference Between Text and Reported Summary

The day before yesterday, newspapers in Taiwan published remarks by Chiang Ching-kuo, made when he received the heads of various groups of people who attended the national development seminar. The timing of the publication of the speech is worth noting. Chiang Ching-kuo made these remarks on 22 July and the next day newspapers in Taiwan published a summary of his remarks. However, it was not until the day before yesterday, nearly 3 weeks after he spoke, that the text of the remarks was published.

The timing of the publication of the text is strange, but it is even more strange that the major points of the remarks were not included in the summary which was published 3 weeks earlier. It is especially strange that the previously reported summary mentioned nothing about what was said in his remarks about Beijing's proposal for "peaceful reunification."

In Regard To Dealing With Liao Chingzhi's Letter

Another point to consider is Liao Chengzhi's letter to Chiang Ching-kuo. On 24 July, 2 days after Chiang Ching-kuo spoke to those who attended the national development seminar, Liao Chengzhi sent a letter which said: "Through all the disasters, brotherhood has remained; a smile at meeting, and enmity is banished." It was said that the letter reached Taipei the same day it was sent.

When the Taiwan authorities published the text of Chiang Ching-kuo's remarks they focused on stressing the point that Taiwan would "never negotiate with the CPC." This was very different from the reported summary that was published 3 weeks earlier.

This difference was perhaps due to internal reasons, but it was perhaps also due to some external consideration. Whatever the case, we can see that although the remarks were made before Liao Chengzhi sent his letter, the recent publication of the remarks is in no way meant to be a response to Liao's letter.

Admitting Beijing Under Pressure Both at Home and Abroad.

Although, in his speech, Chiang Ching-kuo was resolute in refusing to hold talks on peaceful reunifications, a few things he said betrayed his passive position. He cited the peace negotiations during the war of liberation at the time before the PLA crossed the Chang Jiang, and thought that the peace negotiations at that time "brought about internal conflicts, confused the demarcation line between the enemy and ourselves and made us forget the key goal of the state. As a result, we lost our willpower and our strength." This reference to the past to explain the present situation shows that his present fear is as great as that in the past.

He also talked about international pressure and was of the opinion that "our policy is too rigid and too stubborn and fails to win sympathy in the world." However, he later admitted another fact: "The only reason is because they do not know that if we show the slightest sign of holding talks, the morale of our troops and people will begin to fall, and therefore such an attempt is by no means feasible."

These words show a mentality that can be best described as outwardly strong, inwardly weak.

Begging for Fighter Aircraft From the United States and Calling Back the Spirit of Hideki Tojo.

Though Chiang Ching-kuo talked about the "three people's principles," what the Taiwan authorities have done is far from these principles. For example, in comments by Sun Yun-hsuan to American reporters, published yesterday by the CENTRAL NEWS AGENCY, he still stressed that relations between the United States and China are "beneficial to one another if maintained, but harmful to one another if cut off." Thus, the Taiwan authorities have put their own destiny in other people's hands.

At the same time, when Sun Yun-hsuan said that "although the relevant department in the U.S. Government is not willing to sell us highly sophisticated fighters for the time being," he again stressed that "he hopes the United States will sell new-type fighter aircraft and other weapons."

During the last couple of days, people have been paying attention to the problem concerning the revival of Japanese militarism. Chinese film workers have indignantly pointed out that when the Japanese Eastern Film Company was shooting the film entitled "The Great Japanese Empire," which is aimed at calling back the spirit of Hideki Tojo, the Taiwain authorities sent troops to help the company in shooting the film.

Desire to Abolish Even the National Development Seminar

When Chiang Ching-kuo spoke about his rejection of peaceful negotiations, he obstinately said that "this does not mean we flinch or fear to hold negotiations.: In fact, the Taiwan authorities are even considering whether or not they will abolish the annual national development seminar which is held for appearances sake, because they have found it difficult to deal with the speeches at the meeting (please refer to LIEN HO PAO, 10 August). If we do not call this fear, what should we call it?

TA KUNG PAO ON PRC OPEN-DOOR ECONOMIC POLICY

[Special feature by Tung Kai (5516 0418) "Steady Development Through Using Foreign Investment"]

[Text] Open-Door Policy Will Never Change

Over the past few years, the utilization of foreign funds to run joint ventures has gradually been brought into line with the general plan for China's economic development. Thus, the joint ventures using Chinese and foreign investment have been developing more healthily.

Of the 20 joint ventures using Chinese and foreign investment which were established last year, 16 are light industrial and textile projects, foodstuffs enterprises, electronics and electrical machinery factories and oil projects. This shows that 80 percent of them are industrial items. The joint ventures established in 1980 included three hotels, but no hotels were included among those established in 1981. They were all productive enterprises, most of which were urgently needed in China for economic growth, such as light industrial and textile projects and electronics factories. While developing each of these projects, the advanced technology and equipment which China needs most can be introduced.

Of the 40 joint ventures using Chinese and foreign funds which have been established, 23 are old enterprises to be expanded and rebuilt. Very few of them are new enterprises. This is so even in a large number of other factories and compensatory trade ventures jointly run by Chinese and foreign businessmen. Almost all of them are old enterprises to be rebuilt or expanded or to undergo technological reforms.

This can be seen more clearly from the 130 items which were put forth by the "China investment promotion meeting" held in Guangzhou and for which negotiations are now underway. Only six of them, comprising less than 5 percent, are new projects. More than 95 percent are projects to be expanded, rebuilt or to undergo technological reforms. This shows that China is more interested in using its present enterprises and raising economic returns than in expanding the scope of its capital construction. This is also a requirement of China's economic readjustment and industrial reorganization.

If at the initial stage of cooperation in joint ventures with Chinese and foreign investment there was blindness on the Chinese side and some actions were taken in haste, then, as things have already shown, with the development of cooperation, China has become more serious and careful in combining the establishment of joint ventures with its domestic economic development and has brought it into line with the plan for its national development.

Joint Ventures Brought Into Line With State Plan

Actively bringing the enterprises and projects jointly run by the Chinese and foreign businessmen into line with the state plan for economic development will have a great and profound impact on the economic cooperation between China and other countries. Both sides will benefit from this.

First, it is advantageous to China's economic development to require that all Chinese-foreign cooperative projects suit the needs of China's economic development. For example, such projects as the production of oil, coal, electricity and other forms of energy, the construction of railways, ports and other communications and transporation facilities and the development of postal and telecommunications services, the exploitation of mineral resources and the production of new-type construction materials, the production of some basic components for electronics and other industries and so forth, are not only urgently needed by China today, but are also necessary in the long-term development in the future. Besides, they generally require more investment. Thus they have naturally become the main aspects of China's utilization of foreign capital. Of course, China is also willing to cooperate with foreign businessmen in some projects which can help improve the quality of Chinese products and increase China's export trade.

Second, the procedure of establishing Chinese-foreign cooperative projects will also be greatly changed. At first, due to the lack of necessary preparations in various localities, when foreign businessmen came to talk over the matter, the enterprises usually held talks with them in great haste. However, since the enterprises knew very little about the overall situation and the national economic development arrangements and lacked experience, and some projects which seemed to be needed by the enterprises were actually not urgently needed by the state, although many talks were held, very few resulted in success.

Things are greatly different when the cooperation between Chinese and foreign businessmen is brought into line with the state plan. Each of the projects in which foreign businessmen will cooperate is listed in the plan. When a project is considered to be necessary and foreign capital can be used, priority will be given to this project in the supply of raw materials, water, electricity, gasoline and communications and transportation facilities, conditions will be created for the sales of its products and perfect data will be provided. Then efforts will be made to seek foreign participants.

Reinforce Economic Strength Through Using Foreign Investment

To bring the direct investment of foreign businessmen into line with the state plan is obviously beneficial to China's economic development. In this way, the blind development of similar projects or those which are not urgently needed can be prevented and the waste of manpower and material resources can be avoided. At the same time, foreign investment can be used to augment China's economic strength. Moreover, it is also good for the joint ventures.

First, since the projects are brought into line with the state plan and are deemed necessary by the departments concerned, once the talks are held successfully by both sides in the cooperation and agreements or contracts are signed, it is easier for them to be approved by relevant departments and win support in various aspects.

Second, under the present economic management system in China, raw materials, fuel and transportation facilities for various enterprises are allocated by the state under a unified plan. Most of them cannot be bought from the market. When a project is brought into line with the state or local plan, it means that the state or locality has made an overall accounting of the raw materials, coal, electricity, water, gasoline and transportation facilities needed by this project and can satisfy its needs. Thus, a relatively steady supply of raw materials and energy can be ensured during the construction of the project and after it is put into operation.

Third, China's market is under state unified management. Although in recent years various flexible measures have been adopted in order to stimulate the national economy, generally speaking, China's market is under unified mangament. Except for those to be exported, the products of the joint ventures, which will be sold in China's national market, must suit the needs of China's market. Only those products which have been brought into line with the state plan can have good sales.

Jointly Owned Enterprises Have Independent Decision-Making Power

Some people in foreign countries may think that when they invest in China they will thus be controlled by China's state plan. As a matter of fact, this is a misunderstanding of China's policy. It is only in the macroeconomic sense that joint ventures are brought into line with the state plan. As to the cooperative projects, especially the joint ventures using Chinese and foreign investment, they have been granted independent decision-making power in management in accordance with the provisions in the "Law of the PRC on Joint Ventures Using Chinese and Foreign Investment." The state's plans are only suggestions and references for these enterprises and not directives and orders. All the business activities of the joint ventures are responsible only to the boards of directors, not to the state plan, and both investors share the powers, profits and duties according to the provisions in the signed contracts.

Through the study of the characteristics and trends of China's absorption of foreign investment, we can see that after a few years of practice, China has entered a stage of steady progress in using foreign investment.

HONG KONG OBSERVERS' POSITION PAPER ON 1997

HK130456 Hong Kong SOUTH CHINA MORNING POST in English 13 Aug 82 p 11

[Text] THE HONG KONG OBSERVERS' POSITION PAPER ON THE HKO POLL AND THE FUTURE OF HONG KONG (I.E., THEIR INTERPRETATION). [published in boldface]

The Hong Kong observers believe the future of the territory is an issue which deserves and demands the fullest consideration of Hong Kong people -- NOW. [published in italics] It is too important an issue to leave to the British and Chinese Governments to resolve on their own. Hong Kong's future is a matter which will affect not just investors, but each and every Hong Kong person. On the one hand, the British Government says it has an "unshakeable commitment" to Hong Kong (the words of the former foreign secretary, Lord Carrington). On the other, the Chinese leaders have stated that investors can put their hearts at ease. But what do these statements mean when seen in the context of our ordinary lives? Not a lot.

The atmosphere is confused by public speculation. How can China and Britain know what Hong Kong people want when they have heard only the worried voices of the business community, and when Hong Kong people have not expressed their views? The non-existence of a collective voice is particularly worrying. The observers feel it is important that the people articulate their views on what they want their future to hold. It was toward this objective that we commissioned a public opinion poll in May-June this year.

The observers' poll is first and foremost a fact-finding exercise. However, the data collected provides supporting evidence for our stand on Hong Kong's future and, more precisely, the territory's future administration. Also, we hope our poll's findings will help each Hong Kong person to form his/her own stand. The notion of "borrowed time, borrowed place" must be replaced by a concept of permanence.

The poll showed that 49 percent of the people were concerned about the 1997 problem, against 17 percent who were not concerned at all. Moreover, 33 percent said the issue should be resolved within two years and another 20 percent said it should be resolved within five years.

The observers recognize the People's Republic's formal position on Hong Kong: That it is China's territory which will become part of China eventually. We must face up to the inevitability of change. But before any changes take place, Britain and China must recognize that Hong Kong people have the right to a transition process which safeguards their interests.

Our plea is for a voice in shaping our future, for autonomy. It is NOT [published in italics] a call for independence. We recognize that Hong Kong can never be an independent city state. We ask for autonomy within China. Inherent in our plea is that China appreciates the fact that, due to historical reasons, Hong Kong people have grown up under a totally different social and economic environment. There is thus a need for China to consult the people, not just investors, when it formulates plans for Hong Kong's future. So must Britain. For consultation to be meaningful, Hong Kong people must have a collective voice.

Only 12 percent of the people considered returning Hong Kong to China an acceptable solution. We feel this is not a slight on China's dignity. The reasons why the majority would not like Hong Kong to be returned to China is the fear of a loss of freedoms and the vast difference in living standards.

If China were to tell Hong Kong people in clear terms that there will be no erosion of rights and living standards, the observers believe that reunification with China would be more acceptable to the Hong Kong people. It will also mean an end to the feeling of living in a borrowed place on borrowed time and the start of national price and cultural identity.

It is also important that China recognizes the need to allow Hong Kong people legal titleship to property. Our poll shows that 76 percent of Hong Kong people want to own a flat.

Moreover, 95 percent said they would remain in Hong Kong if the status quo were to be maintained. Though 43 percent of these people said they would emigrate if they had the chance, it is not simply the prospect of a political change which makes them want to leave, but also problems of overcrowding here, on the housing and traffic fronts, as well as crime.

Eighty-seven percent said maintaining the status quo was the most acceptable solution. The observers want to improve on the status quo. The need to do this is obvious: Nearly half of the people (47 percent) consider official explanations of policies inadequate, as against 22 percent who said they were adequate.

Awareness of channels of communication with the government ranged from three percent for the CAC to 30 percent for the district boards. The government's much-vaunted city district offices came a close second to the district boards with only 29 percent. A mere eight percent were aware that Umelco was a channel of communication.

Asked whether they thought the Hong Kong government did a good or bad job in looking after the people's interests, 36 percent said its performance was good, 24 percent that it was poor, 23 percent that it was ordinary, while 17 percent said it was good and bad in parts. A mere two percent thought the government was doing a good job in responding to public opinion.

So much for "government by consultation." The potential for people's involvement in improving the quality of life is still largely untapped: When asked whether they agreed with the view that individuals did not have any long-term plans because of the uncertainty of Hong Kong's future, 59 percent agreed, compared with 34 percent who disagreed. This contrasts with the 73 percent who agreed that "no matter what happens, I must make some contribution to Hong Kong" (only four percent disagreed).

The observers feel that efforts to improve the quality of life -- by having a more caring community -- require long-term planning, the sort which generally does not exist in the government as well as among individuals now.

The governments of China, Britain and Hong Kong must realise that Hong Kong people stand to gain or lose the most, whatever solution is reached over the 1997 issue -- hence their obligation to listen to the people's views.

The way of life to which we have grown accustomed -- the freedoms of thought, speech, of responsible action, of socio-economic advancement, and our right to a rising standard of living in a modern economy -- is not guaranteed by the British and Chinese statements uttered so far. Moreover, 62 percent of the people polled said they did not regard as adequate the assurances given by Chinese leaders to date.

Despite the fact that 84 percent of the people's lives are not currently affected by the uncertainty of Hong Kong's future, and that only 38 percent feel their views have any influence, an overwhelming majority -- 95 percent -- felt the people should play a part in deciding the future of Hong Kong.

The observers feel that if preservation of the Hong Kong way of life -- and improvements to it -- is to be achieved, they must articulate their desire to see this. There is no need to feel helpless. After all, 89 percent consider Hong Kong as home. We must not be afraid of wanting to preserve our interests, because this wish can be directed to help China's modernization efforts.

By preserving and enhancing the one asset we have -- enterprising human resources -- the world can look upon Hong Kong as a great Chinese community and a centre of efficiency for business and financial interests. Already, 86 percent of the people say they like living here. If these people can be convinced that they can make their life investment here -- that Hong Kong is a place where they can be proud of bringing up a family, and be buried -- there can be no doubt that this Chinese territory can do a lot more than just earn China 40 percent of its foreign exchange.

For people to be forced to give up the things they hold dear about life in Hong Kong -- the freedoms and the ability to earn and spend money -- would not help China.

The future of Hong Kong, as the observers see it, is not a question of Chinese dignity. The most important issue is to find an administrative solution which will preserve and enhance the confidence of Hong Kong people so that they can have a positive role to play in shaping the history of this piece of Chinese territory. The observers cannot offer a solution to the 1997 problem. Solutions must be reached by negotiations -- and the views of the people must be taken into account.

The following is a summary by percentage of the acceptability of the five possible solutions:

	Return Hong Kong to China	Special Economic Zone to China	Status Quo	Independent	Hong Kong To Remain Under British Administration With Sovereignty Belonging to China

VICE PREMIER WAN LI MEETS WITH FAO OFFICIAL

[Text] Beijing, August 16 (XINHUA) -- Chinese Vice-Premier Wan Li met and had a cordial talk today with Dr. M. Swaminathan, independent chairman of the U.N. Food and Agriculture Organization Council and director general of the International Rice Research Institute, and members of his party. Vice-Premier Wan said China is developing agriculture in the light of its actual conditions such as a vast territory, a huge population and comparatively less arable land. "We develop agriculture not for profits but for providing the people with more and better food and producing more and better raw materials for industry," he said. "At the same time, we should also work for a better ecological environment."

The Chinese vice-premier said China and FAO have cooperated very well in recent years. He called for more cooperation and exchanges between the two sides. Dr. Swaminathan said he is deeply impressed by China's agricultural development. He said he will continue to work for the expansion of relations between FAO and China. He Kang, vice-minister of agriculture, animal husbandry and fishery, was also present.

NATO SCHEDULED TO BEGIN AUTUMN MANEUVERS 2 SEP

[Text] Brussels, August 13 (XINHUA) -- About 250,000 soldiers from all the allies of NATO's military integration are to take part in the upcoming autumn maneuvers, a spokesman of the Supreme Headquarters of Allied Powers in Europe (SHAPE) told XINHUA today. The annual maneuvers, code-named "Autumn Forge", will begin at Naples, Italy, on September 2 and continue through mid-November from the northern coast of Norway to the eastern borders of Turkey.

The spokesman, in a telephone call from Casteau, Belgium, said focus points of the maneuvers with 24 sub-exercises will include U.S. strategic enforcement called "Reforger" (return of forces to Germany), mobile forces support in the northern region and operational coordination in "combined fortress" of the central region. He said that the maneuvers are designed to test the readiness and combat power of the allied troops and make them more qualified for NATO's strategy of deterring future wars in Europe.

PRC-U.S. COMMUNIQUE ON TAIWAN ARMS SALES ISSUED

Text of Communique

OW171102 Beijing XINHUA in English 1100 GMT 17 Aug 82

["China, U.S. Issue Joint Communique on U.S. Arms Sales to Taiwan" -- XINHUA headline; Beijing XINHUA Domestic Service in Chinese at 1131 GMT carried the "text" of this communique; the transliterations and STC's supplied following the capitalized passages below are derived from that account, as is the one variant wording below.]

[Text] Beijing, August 17 (XINHUA) -- The Governments of China and the United States today issued a joint communique on GRADUALLY REDUCING AND FINALLY RESOLVING [fen bu zhou zhi dao zui hou che di jie jue 0433 2976 7532 4160 0451 2584 0683 1796 1646 6043 0414] U.S. arms sale to Taiwan. [The Domestic Service account renders final phrase as ". . . resolving the question of U.S. arms sales to Taiwan." Adding words "the question."]

1. In the joint communique on the establishment of diplomatic relations on January 1, 1979, issued by the Government of the United States of America and the Government of the People's Republic of China, the United States of America recognized the Government of the People's Republic of China as the sole legal government of China, and it ACKNOWLEDGED [cheng ren 2110 6126] the Chinese position that there is but one China and Taiwan is part of China. Within that context, the two sides agreed that the people of the United States would continue to maintain cultural, commercial, and other unofficial relations with the people of Taiwan. On this basis, relations between the United States and China were normalized.

2. The question of United States arms sales to Taiwan was not settled in the course of negotiations between the two countries on establishing diplomatic relations. The two sides held differing positions, and the Chinese side stated that it would raise the issue again following normalization. Recognizing that this issue would seriously hamper the development of United States-China relations, they have held further discussions on it, during and since the meetings between President Ronald Reagan and Premier Zhao Ziyang and between Secretary of State Alexander M. Haig, Jr., and Vice Premier and Foreign Minister Huang Hua in October 1981.

3. Respect for each other's sovereignty and territorial integrity and non-interference in each other's internal affairs constitute the fundamental principles guiding United States-China relations. These principles were confirmed in the Shanghai Communique of February 28, 19[illegible] and reaffirmed in the joint communique on the establishment of diplomatic relat[illegible]ich came into effect on January 1, 1979. Both sides emphatically state that these principles continue to govern all aspects of their relations.

4. The Chinese Government reiterates that the question of Taiwan is China's internal affair. The message to compatriots in Taiwan issued by China on January 1, 1979, promulgated a fundamental policy of striving for peaceful reunification of the motherland. The nine-point proposal put forward by China on September 30, 1981, represented a further major effort under this fundamental policy to strive for a peaceful solution to the Taiwan question.

5. The United States Government attaches great importance to its relations with China and reiterates that it has no intention of infringing on Chinese sovereignty and territorial integrity, or interfering in China's internal affairs, or pursuing a policy of "two Chinas" or "one, China, one Taiwan." The United States Government UNDERSTANDS AND APPRECIATES [li jie bing xian shang 3810 6043 0017 2946 6339] the Chinese policy of striving for a peaceful resolution of the Taiwan as indicated in China's message to compatriots in Taiwan issued on January 1, 1979, and the nine-point proposal put forward by China on September 30, 1981. The new situation which has emerged with regard to the Taiwan question also provides favorable conditions for the settlement of United States-China differences over United States arms sales to Taiwan.

6. Having in mind the foregoing statements of both sides, the United States Government states that it does not seek to carry out a long-term policy of arms sales to Taiwan, that its arms sales to Taiwan will not exceed, EITHER IN QUALITATIVE OR IN QUANTITATIVE TERMS, [zai xing neng he shu liang shang 0961 1840 5174 0735 2422 6852 0006], the level of those supplied in recent years since the establishment of diplomatic relations between the United States and China, and that IT INTENDS GRADUALLY TO REDUCE [ta chun bei zhu bu jian shao 1338 0402 0271 6632 2975 8096 1421]its sale of arms to Taiwan, leading, over a period of time, to a FINAL RESOLUTION [zui hou di jie jue 2584 0683 4104 6043 0414]. In so stating, the United States ACKNOWLEDGES [cheng ren 2110 6126] China's consistent position regarding the thorough settlement of this issue.

7. In order to bring about, over a period of time, a final settlement of the question of United States arms sales to Taiwan, which is an issue rooted in history, the two governments will make every effort to adopt measures and create conditions conducive to the thorough settlement of this issue.

8. The development of United States-China relations is not only in the interests of the two peoples, but also conducive to peace and stability in the world. The two sides are determined, on the principle of equality and mutual benefit, to strengthen their ties in the economic, cultural, educational scientific, technological and other fields and make STRONG [zhong da 6850 1129], joint efforts for the continued development of relations between the governments and peoples of the United States and China.

9. In order to bring about the healthy development of United States-China relations, maintain world peace and oppose aggression and expansion, the two governments reaffirm the principles agreed on by the two sides in the Shanghai Communique and the joint communique on the establishment of diplomatic relations. The two sides will maintain contact and hold appropriate CONSULTATIONS [cuo shang 4322 0794] on bilateral and international issues of common interest.

Spokesman's Statement

[Text] Beijing, August 17 (XINHUA) -- The spokesman of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China today made a statement on the China-U.S. joint communique on the settlement of the issue of U.S. arms sales to Taiwan. The statement reads as follows:

1. Following discussions, the Government of the People's Republic of China and the Government of the United States of America have reached agreement on the question of United States sale of arms to Taiwan. The two sides have released the joint communique simultaneously today.

The United States sale of arms to Taiwan is an issue which affects China's sovereignty. Back in 1978, when the two countries held negotiations on the establishment of diplomatic relations, the Chinese Government stated in explicit terms its opposition to the U.S. arms sales to Taiwan. As this issue could not be settled at that time, the Chinese side suggested that the two sides continue discussions on the issue following the establishment of diplomatic relations. It is evident that failure to settle this issue is bound to impair seriously the relations between the two countries.

With a view to safeguarding China's sovereignty and removing the obstacle to the development of relations between the two countries, Premier Zhao Ziyang held discussions with President Ronald Reagan on this issue during the Cancun meeting in Mexico in October 1981. Subsequently, Vice Premier and Foreign Minister Huang Hua continued the discussions with Secretary of State Alexander M. Haig, Jr., in Washington. As from December 1981, the two sides started concrete discussions through diplomatic channels in Beijing. During this period, U.S. Vice President George Bush, entrusted by President Reagan, paid a visit to China in May 1982, when he held discussions with the Chinese leaders on the same subject. [Beijing XINHUA Domestic Service in Chinese at 1144 GMT on 17 Aug carries a virtually identical account of the Foreign Ministry spokesman's statement. It reads as follows at this point: "...when he held discussions with the Chinese leaders. The joint communique...." deleting words] The joint communique released by the two sides today is the outcome of repeated negotiations between China and the United States over the past ten months. It has laid down the principles and steps by which the question of U.S. arms sales to Taiwan should be settled.

2. The joint communique reaffirms the principles of respect for each other's sovereignty and territorial integrity and non-interference in each other's internal affairs as embodied in the Shanghai Communique and the joint communique on the establishment of diplomatic relations between China and the United States. Both sides also emphatically state that these principles continue to govern all aspects of their relations. That is to say, the question of U.S. arms sales to Taiwan must be settled on these principles. Needless to say, only by strictly observing these principles in dealing with the existing or new issues between the two countries will it be possible for their relations to develop healthily.

3. In compliance with the above principles governing the relations between the two countries, the U.S. arms sales to Taiwan should have been terminated altogether long ago. But considering that this is an issue left over by history, the Chinese Government, while upholding the principles, has agreed to settle it step by step. The U.S. side has committed that, as the first step, its arms sales to Taiwan will not exceed, either in qualitative or in quantitative terms, the level of those supplied in recent years since the establishment of diplomatic relations between the two countries, and that they will be gradually reduced, leading to a final resolution of this issue over a period of time. The final resolution referred to here certainly implies that the U.S. arms sales to Taiwan must be completely terminated over a period of time. And only a thorough settlement of this issue can remove the obstacles in the way of developing relations between the two countries.

4. In the joint communique, the Chinese Government reiterates in clear-cut terms its position that "the question of Taiwan is China's internal affair." The U.S. side also indicates that it has no intention of infringing on Chinese sovereignty and territorial integrity, or interfering in China's internal affairs, or pursuing a policy of "two Chinas" or "one China, one Taiwan." The Chinese side refers in the joint communique to its fundamental policy of striving for peaceful reunification of the motherland for the purpose of further demonstrating the sincere desire of the Chinese Government and people to strive for a peaceful solution to the Taiwan question. On this issue, which is purely China's internal affair, no misinterpretation or foreign interference is permissible.

5. It must be pointed out that the present joint communique is based on the principle embodied in the joint communique on the establishment of diplomatic relations between China and the United States and the basic norms guiding international relations and has nothing to do with the "Taiwan Relations Act" formulated unilaterally by the United States.

The "Taiwan Relations Act" seriously contravenes the principles embodied in the joint communique on the establishment of diplomatic relations between the two countries, and the Chinese Government has consistently been opposed to it. All interpretations designed to link the present joint communique to the "Taiwan Relations Act" are in violation of the spirit and substance of this communique and are thus unacceptable. [The XINHUA Domestic Service version reads as follows at this point: "... All interpretations designed to try to link the present joint communique ...." adding words]

6. The agreement reached between the Governments of China and the United States on the question of U.S. arms sales to Taiwan only marks a beginning of the settlement of this issue. What is important is that the relevant provisions of the joint communique are implemented in earnest, so that the question of U.S. arms sales to Taiwan can be resolved thoroughly at an early date. This is indispensable to the maintenance and development of Sino-U.S. relations.

[Text] Beijing, 17 Aug (XINHUA) -- RENMIN RIBAO publishes an editorial on 17 August entitled "Strictly Observe the Agreement and Overcome Obstructions." The following is the text of the editorial:

The Governments of China and the United States issued a joint communique on 17 August announcing that they have reached agreement on U.S. arms sales to Taiwan, following a step-by-step approach leading to the final and complete settlement of the problem. The crisis that threatened Sino-U.S. relations in recent months has thus been eased. This is an act that people welcome.

Since the establishment of Sino-U.S. diplomatic relations, the relations between the two countries have developed, and this has been welcomed by peoples of the two countries. However, the relations between the two countries were always shrouded in dark clouds. Everyone knows that an important principle governing the normalization of Sino-U.S. relations is that the United States recognizes that there is only one China and that Taiwan is part of China and that the PRC Government is the sole legal government of China. After the establishment of Sino-U.S. relations, however, the United States formulated the "Taiwan Relations Act" and regarded Taiwan as a political entity and persisted in selling weapons to Taiwan. Such an act of brazenly violating China's sovereignty and interfering in China's internal affairs was naturally and resolutely opposed by the Chinese Government and people. The Chinese Government time and again reiterated its position, asking the United States to stop selling weapons to Taiwan. With regard to a problem that is connected to its sovereignty, the Chinese Government and people will never make any unprincipled concession. If this problem is not properly solved, not only will Sino-U.S. relations not be maintained and consolidated, but on the contrary, they will face the possibility of retrogression.

Now, after consultations and negotiations, an agreement has finally been reached between China and the United States. In the joint communique, both sides first reaffirmed the basic principles governing Sino-American relations, which were established in the Shanghai Communique and the communique on the establishment of diplomatic relations between China and the United States, namely, "mutual respect of sovereignty and territorial integrity and noninterference in each other's internal affairs," and emphatically declared that these principles still govern every aspect of Sino-American relations. Obviously, this includes the issue of selling arms to Taiwan by the United States. It not only touches the main point of the problem, but also points out the correct way for resolving this problem.

Both China and the United States are equal sovereign countries and the relations between the two countries must be built on the basis of the five principles of peaceful coexistence. "Mutual respect of sovereignty and territorial integrity and noninterference in each other's internal affairs" as stated in the five principles must not be empty talk, but should be the principle which both sides have to uphold in practical activities. The United States has repeatedly expressed that it will respect China's sovereignty and territorial integrity and that it has no intention of interfering in China's internal affairs. The problem now is that the United States must be as good as its word and take practical measures to solve the problem of selling arms to Taiwan.

China has always adhered to a clear-cut stand on the problem of U.S. arms sales to Taiwan. We hold that the United States, in selling arms to Taiwan, has violated China's sovereignty; we resolutely oppose this U.S. action. However, in view of the historical factors and in light of the actual circumstances, we agree that the United States may gradually reduce and eventually terminate its arms sales to Taiwan under the prerequisite that the United States respects China's sovereignty in real earnest. In the joint communique, the United States has made three commitments: 1) the specifications of the weapons sold by the United States to Taiwan will not exceed in quality or quantity the level of recent years following establishment of diplomatic relations between China and the United States; 2) the United States will gradually reduce its arms sales to Taiwan; 3) a final settlement of this problem will be reached after a certain period of time. Furthermore, the United States also declared: "It does not seek to carry out a long-term policy of selling weapons to Taiwan." "The United States recognizes China's consistent stand concerning the thorough settlement of this problem." All these are fundamental requirements which the United States must fulfill.

Taiwan is China's territory and the method we choose to solve the Taiwan problem is entirely a problem of China's internal affairs. The United States has no right to demand that China undertake any obligation as to the methods it chooses in solving the Taiwan problem, nor should the United States put forth as a prerequisite condition for the cessation of arms sales to Taiwan that China commit itself to not solving the Taiwan problem by any menas other than a peaceful one. Otherwise, the United States will be interfering in China's internal affairs. During the past few years, we have made tremendous efforts to realize the peaceful reunification of the motherland. The United States has also expressed its understanding and appreciation of China's policy for a peaceful solution of the Taiwan problem. This being the case, the United States should stop its arms sales to Taiwan as soon as possible and refrain from standing in the way of China's peaceful solution of the Taiwan problem.

The issuance of the Sino-U.S. joint communique has broken the deadlock between the two countries in solving the problem of arms sales to Taiwan, but this does not mean that the problem has been completely solved. The dark cloud that has blurred the prospects of Sino-U.S. relations has not been completely swept away. The United States has given some promises, but we have to wait and see whether or not it will prove its sincerity by its actions. We hope that the U.S. Government will sincerely carry out what it has promised and actually, not perfunctorily, reduce its arms sales to Taiwan. Moreover, we hope that the United States will do, as it has promised, its best to adopt measures and create conditions in order to solve this problem at the earliest possible date, and it should not use any excuse to delay the solution to this problem.

It is still necessary to point out that the fundamental obstacle to the development of Sino-U.S. relations is the U.S. "Taiwan Relations Act." The so-called "Taiwan Relations Act" completely violates the principles of the Sino-U.S. joint communique on establishing diplomatic relations. If the decision-makers in Washington insist on handling the relations between both countries in accordance with this U.S. domestic act, Sino-U.S. relations will not only come to a standstill, but will definitely face another crisis. [Beijing XINHUA in English at 1137 GMT on 17 August carries a report on the RENMIN RIBAO 17 August editorial. That version reads as follows at this point: "...Sino-U.S. relations, instead of being further developed, will certainly face yet another grave crisis."]

Sino-U.S. relations traveled a tortuous path before normalization of relations was achieved. In other words, normalization of relations did not come easily. The Chinese Government and the Chinese people hope that Sino-U.S. relations will be further developed and have made great efforts on this. The reason for this is because we think that such relations not only accord with the fundamental interests of both China and the United States, but are also conducive to safeguarding world peace and stability. However, the maintenance, consolidation and development of Sino-U.S. relations cannot rely solely on the efforts of China. If the United States really treasures Sino-U.S. relations, it should comply with the principles of the Sino-U.S. joint communique on establishing diplomatic relations in its actual practice and fulfill its promises made in the joint communique which was released on 17 August.

[Text] Beijing, 14 Aug (XINHUA) -- RENMIN RIBAO 15 August editorial: "Past Experience, If Not Forgotten, Is a Guide for the Future." The editorial reads in full as follows:

Japan officially announced its unconditional surrender on 15 August 1945, thus ending World War II. It is fully 37 years since then. Tremendous changes have taken place in the world situation over the past 37 years. China, which had long been subject to Western imperialist aggression, especially to oriental Japanese aggression, has turned from a semifeudal and semicolonial country into an independent, socialist state with the beginnings of prosperity. Many other Asian countries which had also been subject to Japanese and other imperialist aggression and occupation have cast off colonial rule and achieved independence. Japan, whose postwar Constitution stipulates that it shall renounce war forever, has peacefully developed from a vanquished country into a big, world economic power. Thanks to the efforts of the two peoples and two governments, China and Japan normalized their diplomatic relations on the basis of self-examination by the Japanese Government with regard to the war of aggression against China. The friendly and cooperative relations between China and Japan are entering a new stage of development. Practice proves that the consolidation and development of Sino-Japanese friendly and cooperative relations accord completely with the aspirations of the people of the two countries and their interests and are an important factor for maintaining peace in the Asia-Pacific region and the world. The 10th anniversary of the normalization of Sino-Japanese diplomatic relations will fall on 29 September this year, and the governments and people of the two countries have prepared or are preparing various grand celebrations for this occasion.

At this time, however, some people in Japan are taking a series of noticeable measures in an attempt to make the Japanese people, especially the younger generation, forget about the history of Japanese aggression against China and other Asian countries and to guide them once again onto the beaten track of militarism. In revising textbooks, the Japanese Ministry of Education has distorted the history of Japanese aggression against China, Korea and various Southeast Asian countries. This is one of the measures that is particularly intolerable. Therefore, today we should draw necessary lessons from reviewing the history of Japanese aggression against various countries in Asia and the Pacific, especially the history of Japanese aggression against China, and this is of extremely great significance for the consolidation and development of Sino-Japanese friendship.

The emergence of Japanese militarism was not accidental. It was an inevitable outcome of the development of Japanese capitalism. After the Meiji restoration in the 1860's, Japanese capitalism rapidly developed and gradually embarked on the road of aggression and expansion. Korea and China -- Japan's neighbors -- became the first victims of Japanese militarism. Japan launched a war of aggression against China in 1894 and forced the government of the Qing Dynasty to sign the Shimonoseki treaty, under which Japan forcibly occupied Taiwan, its offshore islands and the Penghu Islands, all territories of China. Following the end of the Russo-Japanese War in 1905, Japan replaced Russia in China and grabbed a number of colonial privileges in northeast China. Japan annexed Korea in 1901. During World War I, Japan took advantage of the opportunity to seize Germany's colonial interests in China and the Pacific islands occupied by Germany. In 1927 Japanese Prime Minister Giichi Tanaka laid down the principle of Japanese armed invasion and occupation of northeast China and submitted the notorious "Tanka memorial to the emperor" in which he said: "Manchuria and Mongolia must first be conquered in order to conquer China, and China must first be conquered in order to conquer the world."

An unprecedentedly large-scale economic crisis occurred in the capitalist world in 1929, and the Japanese ruling clique attempted to find a way out by carrying out aggression and expansion. In the "September 18th incident" created by themselves, the Japanese militarists invaded and occupied northeast China in 1931. By creating the "Lugouqiao incident" on 7 July 1937, Japan unleased a full-scale war of aggression against China, invading and occupying half of China from its coast to its interior and thus igniting the flames of World War II on the Far East battlefield. Japan made a surprise attack on Pearl Harbor in December 1941, unleashed the Pacific war and invaded Southeast Asia and other areas. Using extremely barbarous and brutal means, the Japanese aggressor troops wantonly killed defenseless and peaceful people and maltreated them whereever they went; there were many murders of unparalleled savagery such as the Nanjing massacre, the Singapore massacre, the Philippine massacre, the Harbin single-story bacteriological weapons experimental plant and many other atrocities. They created deep blood debts to Asian and Pacific countries and subjected the people of these countries to great suffering.

On the part of China, Japan's success in every move of its aggression against China was due to the fact that China then was successively under the reactionary rule of the Qing Dynasty, the Beiyang warlords and the Kuomintang and power was not in the hands of the people. The Qing Dynasty was corrupt and incompetent. After the 1911 revolution, the warlords set up separatist regimes and incessantly fought civil wars and various imperialist powers took the opportunity to carve out spheres of influence in China.

After 1927 the Kuomintang government adopted the reactionary policy of "achieving internal stability before resisting foreign aggression," suppressed the people's demand for resisting the Japanese aggression, made repeated concessions to Japan and made Japanese imperialism become more and more arrogant. The situation changed after 1937. The Chinese Communists, shouldering the hope of the nation and the responsibility of history, proposed the establishment of an anti-Japanese National United Front, cooperated with the Kuomintang for the second time and persisted in a protracted resistance against Japanese aggression. They resolutely marched to the forefront of the resistance against Japan, penetrated into the enemy's rear area, mobilized the masses to conduct widespread anti-Japanese guerrilla warfare and set up anti-Japanese base areas behind the enemy lines. The 8th Route Army and the New 4th Army led by the Communist Party of China dealt heavy blows on the Japanese aggressors and engulfed them in the boundless ocean of people's war. With the cooperation and support of antifascist forces in the world, the Chinese people finally defeated Japanese imperialism and forced it to unconditionally surrender on 15 August 1945. The historical course in which the Chinese people went from being the victims of aggression to winning the great victory in the antiaggression struggle proves that people's unity is a fundamental guarantee for preventing aggression and winning victory in an antiaggression struggle. The Communist Party of China was the leading force that united the people throughout China in the struggle for national survival.

By recalling the Japanese aggression against China, Korea and Southeast Asia, we do not mean to settle old accounts with Japan. Since the miserable years of the wanton invasion by Japanese aggressor troops and their slaughter of the Chinese people, we have always held that China and Japan, as close neighbors, have a history of friendship lasting more than 2,000 years and that the Japanese aggression against China only represents a short span in this long history. Moreover, in talking about Japanese aggression, we have always made a strict distinction between the Japanese people and the handful of militarists who were responsible for their war crimes. The Japanese people, who were also victims of Japanese militarism and the war of aggression, are innocent. The militarists drove a large number of Japanese able-bodied men to the battlefield. In the last 3 years of the war alone, as many as 2.6 million Japanese officers and soldiers were killed in action.

One of every two Japanese families had one person pressed into the armed forces. One of every four families had one person killed in action. Two million Japanese women lost their husbands, and several million Japanese children became orphans during the war. The awakened Japanese people joined the anti-Japanese Chinese armymen and people in waging struggles against the war and the militarists who brought them disasters. The Chinese people have deep sympathy for the Japanese people who are victims of war. We do not want to settle old accounts, but they are not to be forgotten, still less to be distorted. We think that the Chinese and Japanese people, taking history as a lesson, should unite with each other and work together to prevent the revival of Japanese militarism and to consolidate and develop the existing, hard-earned friendly relations between China and Japan. The Japanese Education Ministry attempts to make fools of the Japanese people by revising Japanese textbooks and to make them forget the disasters brought on them by the Japanese militarist aggression. This attempt is also a provocation and a threat to the Chinese people and the people of various countries in the Asian and Pacific region. Therefore, the revision has met with strong opposition from the Japanese people, opposition parties and the Chinese people and government. Many discerning members in the Japanese ruling party have also urged their government to make a quick decision and to take proper steps to redress the revision without delay so as to further the friendly relations between Japan and China.

The Japanese aggression against China, Korea and other countries in the Southeast Asian and Pacific region is an objective fact of history which has left feelings of bitterness and profound misery in the memories of the peoples of the countries invaded by Japan.

A series of important international documents signed during and after World War II confirm that the crimes committed by Japan were crimes of aggression. For example:

"The "Cairo Declaration" signed by China, the United States and Britain on 1 December 1943 pointed out: "The objective of the war we, the three great allies are waging is to stop and punish Japan's aggression."

Article 6 of the "Potsdam Proclamation, issued by China, the United States and Britain to demand Japan's surrender," of 26 July 1945 stipulated: "The power and forces that deceive and wrongly lead the Japanese people in an attempt to conquer the world must be permanently eliminated." Article 8 stipulated: "The conditions set in the Cairo Declaration must be met."

"The Japanese surrender document" signed on 2 September 1945 explicitly expressed Japan's acceptance of the "Potsdam Proclamation" and stated "faithful adherence to the terms set in the Potsdam Proclamation...."

On 4 November 1948 the Far East international military tribunal pronounced the principal Japanese war criminals guilty of "destroying peace." According to Article 5A of the 1946 "charter of the Far East international military tribunal," the "crime of destroying peace" denotes "planning, preparing, starting or conducting a declared or undelcared war of aggression...." More than half of the 55 charges brought against the principal Japanese war criminals in the indictment concerned the "crime of destroying peace." The first charge listed in the indcitment was that all the defendents jointly planned and plotted to gain for Japan military, political and economic control of east Asia and the Pacific and Indian Ocean regions and for this purpose waged a war of aggression. The 2d, 3d, 4th, 6th, 19th, 27th and 29th charges listed in the indictment were that all the defendents plotted and planned to occupy China's northeastern provinces by force and control China and for this purpose prepared and started the war of aggression against China. The court verdicts of the military tribunal affirmed the aforesaid crimes committed by Japan and explicitly pointed out that Japan waged a war of aggression against China.

The 1945 "UN Charter" also confirmed the aggressive nature of the wars waged by Japan, Germany and Italy during World War II and calls for preventing these countries from "repeating their policies of aggression."

These international documents show that the international community generally agrees that Japan had launched a war of aggression against China. Moreover, Japan has also repeatedly admitted this after it signed the "surrender document." In the China-Japan joint statement of 1972, the Japanese Government expressed its deep reproach for Japan's responsibility in causing enormous damages in the past to the Chinese people through war. At the same time, it expressed its adherence to the stand of complying with the Potsdam Proclamation. The 1978 China-Japan treaty of peace and friendship reaffirmed the principles contained in the China-Japan joint statement. Now the Japanese Education Ministry is trying to reverse the verdict on the crimes of aggression committed by Japanese militarism through the revision of school textbooks. Is this not disregarding of the above-mentioned international documents, including the Cairo Declaration, the Potsdam Proclamation, the Japanese surrender document, the verdicts of the Far East international military tribunal and the UN Charter? Is this not a violation of the principles of the China-Japan joint statement and the China-Japan treaty of peace and friendship? Can this be considered as solely Japan's "internal affairs?"

As everyone knows, World War II began with the Japanese invasion of China. Germany and Italy, creators of a holocaust unprecendented in human history together with Japan, assumed responsibility for the war after their surrender, and the school textbooks in the two countries all mentionthe crimes of aggression committed by the Nazis and Fascists. To our surprise, the Japanese Education Ministry is now trying to reverse the verdict of history by revising school textbooks. Is this not a very dangerous signal calling for vigilance of the peoples of the world?

The distortion of the history of Japanese aggression and prettification of militarism by the Japanese Education Ministry are definitely not the wishes of the Japanese people, but are entirely against their wishes. The Japanese people positively call for genuine friendship with China from generation to generation. In the past 10 years or so, Japanese Government personages have also professed the same on many occasions. So long as the government and the public in both countries properly draw lessons from past history, the friendship between the two countries will be able to develop soundly under solid conditions. In the more than 30 years since the war, Japanese people of all classes and strata and friendly personages including many people with broad vision in political, cultural, educational, press and economic circles have worked constantly and positively to promote Sino-Japanese friendship and have made valuable contributions to the normalization of diplomatic relations and the signing of the treaty of peace and friendship between the two countries. After the normalization of diplomatic relations between China and Japan, friendly Japanese personages in various circles have played a tremendous role in developing economic cooperation and cultural exchanes between the two countries. The fact that they have expressed bitter indignation at the distortion of historical facts by the Japanese Education Ministry in screening textbooks reflects the firm will of the masses of Japanese people against revival of militarism.

It is by no means accidental that there have emerged some elements in Japan who oppose Sino-Japanese friendship, nor will they suddenly disappear of their own free will. Because of its reemergence as a capitalist economic power and developments in the world situation in the past three decades or so, Japan wants very much to play a bigger role in international politics. Thus some militarists who refuse to draw lessons from and try to prettify the war of aggression think the time has come to revive the old dream of the "Greater East Asia Coprosperity Sphere."

The distortion of history in textbooks, the shooting of reactionary films extolling militarism like the "Great Japanese Empire," the formal rites to pay homage to the Yasukuni Shrine, where memorial tablets of militarists are enshrined, the plans to revise the Constitution, the attempt to establish official relations with China's territory Taiwan, and so on and so forth are all trends that merit serious attention. These people strongly appraise the situation and regard the Chinese people's attaching importance to the development of Sino-Japanese friendship and cooperation as a means of seeking help from Japan. They think that the Chinese people would stoop to compromise and meekly resign themselves to the situation no matter how history is distorted and how their national feelings and pride are insulted. Small as it is, this force is extremely dangerous to Sino-Japanese relations. If unchecked, it would be very harmful to Sino-Japanese friendship.

The normalization of diplomatic relations and the development of friendly relations between China and Japan are a result achieved by the Chinese and Japanese peoples through long years of common efforts. They are also the outcome of introspection by the Japanese Government over past acts of aggression. The late Premier Zhou Enlai said in 1972 when Sino-Japanese diplomatic relations were normalized: "In the half century since 1894, the Japanese militarist aggression against China brought untold sufferings to the Chinese people, and the Japanese people, too, suffered a great deal from it. The past experience, if not forgotten, is a guide for the future. We should bear this in mind." Ten years have passed since the publication of the Sino-Japanese joint statement, and 4 years since the signing of the Sino-Japanese treaty of peace and friendship. The day marking the 10th anniversary of the normalization of diplomatic relations between China and Japan is around the corner. While in Japan in May this year, Premier Zhao Ziyang put forth three principles for Sino-Japanese economic relations, namely, "peace and friendship, equality and mutual benefit and durable stability." This statement shows that China takes a forward-looking attitude and sincerely hopes to be on good terms with Japan from generation to generation. But to make this desire come true, the Chinese and Japanese peoples should not forget the disaster and suffering brought to the two peoples by the war between aggression and antiaggression which ended 37 years ago, and should see to it that this miserable passage of history is never repeated. For the sake of the fundamental interests of the Chinese and Japanese peoples, as well as for peace in Asia and the world as a whole, let us join hands and make common efforts, resolutely opposing all attempts to reverse history and ensuring that Sino-Japanese relations and friendship between the two peoples develop steadily on a solid basis.

Japanese Official Castigated

["Commentary: Most Absurd Conception of History of the Times" -- XINHUA headline]

[Text] Beijing, August 14 (XINHUA) -- The statement made by the director general of Japan's National Land Agency Monday in Nagoya attacking criticisms raised in China, Korea and the Southeast Asian countries on screening of school textbooks by Japan's Education Ministry is the "most absurd conception of history of the times." Yukiyasu Matsuno was the fist Japanese senior official who openly attacked these criticisms of distortion of the Second World War history as acts "interfering in Japan's internal affairs."

Again, it was he who made more rude and absurd attacks on Monday. While charging those who raised criticisms with [being] "oversensitive", he said that "conception of history varies between nations. Therefore, there is no need for each other to go into it seriously." In his view, no country would admit its evil deeds in educating its people. He again distorted the history of the Nanjing massacre to embellish Japanese militarism.

According to Matsuno's conception of history, appraisal on the rights and wrongs of a certain historical event can be made at will, and any nation can revise history the way it likes. Again, according to his logic, the Japanese people should extol Hideki Tojo as a hero and the Japanese war of aggression as a very good thing. Matsuno's conception of history is absurd because he has dressed himself up as a spokesman for the Japanese nation. In fact, he can only represent a handful of Japanese who attempt to revive militarism. The more than 100 million Japanese people will not accept him as their representative.

During the Japanese war of aggression in China, the Japanese people, as victims of the war, and Japanese soldiers then fighting in China did not regard the war as a good thing. The emergence of anti-war organizations among the ranks of Japanese soldiers was an effective evidence of this. A stronger evidence of it is provided by the fact that today, Japanese public opinion and political circles, including many men of the Liberal Democratic Party, and the broad masses of the Japanese people do not approve of the revision of textbooks by the Japanese Education Ministry.

Matsuno's historical conception runs counter to the traditional historical conception of the Japanese nation. In ancient times, the Japanese people often compared history to a "mirror". That is to say, history, like a mirror, should reflect the objective reality and play the role of drawing lessons from the past as a guide for the future. As for the specific wars of aggression against other countries by the Japanese militarists in modern times, Japanese historians have written many objective and true-to-the-fact historical notes. Matsuno's historical conception is but one held by a handful of Japanese militarists.

Matsuno asserted that those foreign critics of Japanese Education Ministry's revision of textbooks are "over-sensitive". Shouldn't the people of those countries who had suffered so much from the Japanese war of aggression make strong reactions when they have seen the symptoms of a revival of militarism in Japan? Such a sensitivity should be regarded as a manifestation of a very sound mind. If today the Japanese people and the people of other Asian countries were as numb as Matsuno has hoped for, wouldn't the danger of another disaster befall Japan and Asia tomorrow?

TU Leader's Speech

[Report: "The History of the Japanese Militarists' War of Aggression Against China Should Never Be Distorted -- Published Speech by Fang Ming, Chairman of China Educational Workers Trade Union"]

[Text] On 24 July, Fang Ming, chairman of the China Educational Workers Trade Union published a speech on the distortion of the history of the Japanese militarists' war of aggression against China by the Japanese Education Ministry in the textbooks for Japanese middle and primary schools. In his speech, he pointed out that the China Educational Workers Trade Union and the broad ranks of Chinese teachers and staff had expressed their great indignation at the Japanese Education Ministry for unscrupulously hurting the feelings of the Chinese people by distorting the history of the aggression against China.

Fang Ming said that the war of aggression against China launched by the Japanese militarists brought tremendous disasters to and inflicted enormous losses on the Chinese people and also brought great sufferings to the Japanese people and that this was a historical fact that no one could deny.

Fang Ming said that the sacred duties of a teacher are to teach his students to be honest and to respect facts and follow truth. However, in revising the textbooks, the Japanese Education Ministry is publicly distorting the history of the Japanese militarists' aggression against China. This will never be allowed. The General Council of Japanese Trade Unions and the Japanese Teaching Staff Trade Union have clearly pointed out that they will never allow the "aggression against" China to be distorted as "advancing [Jin Chu 6651 0427] into China nor will they ever allow anyone to instill distorted history into the minds of the youngsters. The China Educational Workers Trade Union and the broad ranks of the Chinese teachers and staff greatly admire and firmly support the Japanese teachers' just stand and their strong desire for strengthening the Sino-Japanese friendship and safeguarding world peace. This is also the strong demand of the Chinese teachers and teaching staff. Sino-Japanese friendship is the trend of the times and the desire of the people. We hope that the Japanese Education Ministry will follow the trend of the times and refrain from doing anything that will harm Sino-Japanese friendship.

Tokyo Rallies Protest Changes

[Text] Tokyo, August 15 (XINHUA) -- Japanese opposition parties, trade unions and mass organizations held rallies here today calling on the Education Ministry to correct the mistake of whitewashing the Japanese history of aggression through screening school textbooks'. They also voiced strong opposition to the Japanese authorities "plot to revise the peace Constitution."

The Japan Socialist Party, the General Council of Trade Unions of Japan, the Federation of Independent Unions, the National Federation of Industrial Organizations and the National League for the Protection of the Constitution held an "anti-war peace rally" here this morning.

Ichio Asukata, chairman of the Japan Socialist Party, said at the rally: "The concept of the peace Constitution formed after the war has been damaged because of the recent moves taken by the government and the Liberal Democratic Party." "The issue of screening school textbooks is not merely a matter of distorting history but should be viewed as a move taken by the Liberal Democratic Party to re-examine the post-war peace system," Asukata said. He stressed that if such an intention is realized, "Japan would again embark on the road of militarism."

He called on the people to make efforts to prevent Japan from repeating the mistake of launching an aggressive war.

A citizens council for pondering school textbooks submitted a protest after a rally today to Education Minister Heiji Ogawa, saying that the distortion of history by the Education Ministry "is a threat to peace and democracy and will bring misfortune to the young people." The protest called on the Education Ministry to admit its mistake and correct the errors in the revised school textbooks. Meetings held by many mass organizations today demanded that August 15 be set as Japan's peace day." They opposed any move aimed to plunge Japan into another war. August 15 is the day when Japan announced its unconditional surrender 37 years ago.

JAPAN, CHINA COMMEMORATE WAR ANNIVERSARY

Japan Holds Memorial Service

[Text] Tokyo, August 15 (XINHUA) -- The Japanese Government held a memorial rite here today for the fallen in the Japanese war of aggression in China and the Pacific region. This is the first service to be held since the Japanese Cabinet decided on April 13 this year to designate August 15 as the annual anniversary for "paying homage to the war dead and praying for peace".

The service was attended by 1,000 central and local government officials and representatives of political parties and social organizations. They included Prime Minister Zenko Suzuki, Speaker of the House of Representatives Hajime Fukuda, President of the House of Councillors Masatoshi Tokunaga, Chief of the Supreme Court Takaaki Hattori, Cabinet ministers, Dietmen, governors of prefectures and presidents of prefectural assemblies. 6,500 representatives of the bereaved families were also present.

Crown Prince Akihito and his wife attended the service on behalf of Emperor Hirohito and Empress Nagako. In his memorial speech Suzuki said that three millions of his compatriots died in the raging war for the country's "peace and prosperity" and their dear ones "promising future". Whenever recalling them to mind, Suzuki said, "I am full of sorrow and pity." Similar services were held in various other places of Japan today, the Ministry of Health and Social Affairs said.

After the Tokyo service, Suzuki went to the Yasukuni Shrine to pay his homage to the war fallen. Cabinet ministers, except those not in Tokyo, also went to the shrine. Suzuki signed the visitors book with the title of "prime minister of the Cabinet". When the reporters asked whether he came in his official capacity or just personally, Suzuki replied: "I come here to mourn the war dead and pray for lasting peace to avert war catastrophe."

According to Japanese press reports, previously two Japanese prime ministers had visited the Yasukuni Shrine to pay their personal homage, and Zenko Suzuki also visited the shrine in his own name last year.

In the past two days, a number of organizations and members of opposition parties in Japan held rallies or made statements opposing Cabinet members to pay visits to the Yasukuni Shrine or take other moves to embellish the aggressive war. [as received]

Crimes Condemned in Guangdong

Japanese aircraft started attacks on Guangzhou in September 1937. By April and May 1938, the attacks had become rabid, and over 10,000 people had been killed in the city. The Japanese army committed frightful crimes while occupying Shunde County. They looted property, burned down houses, raped women, released poison gas, and killed people at will. There were 850,000 people in this county before the war, but only 380,000 remained when the war ended.

Most of the 120 exhibits are photographs, the rest are written materials. Contents of the first part of the exhibition include the crimes committed by the Japanese aggressor army in north China, Shanghai and Nanjing, together with the crimes committed by them in Guangdong. The second part is entitled "The Japanese Government Must Correct its Errors in Distorting History in Order To Promote Sustained Development of Sino-Japanese Friendship."

Hunan Exhibition on Crimes

[Text] An exhibition of photographs of atrocities committed by Japanese militarism in its aggression against China opened in the Hunan Provincial Musuem on 14 August. The large number of photographs expose the towering crimes of the Japanese aggressor troops in Hunan. For instance, in 1943 the Japanese aggressor troops killed and burned in the (Fuxinxiang) area of Hanshou County. In the counties around the Dongting Lake, they killed people by shooting them, burying them alive or using poison gas on them, and raped and abused women. They killed or injured over 100 teachers and students in an air attack on Hunan University. All these things are vividly depicted. The atrocities of the Japanese aggressor troops in Hunan involved 55 counties and municipalities. There are 10,900 atrocities of which historical records exist. Over 920,000 Hunan people were killed.

Many of the masses visiting the exhibition angrily pointed out: The evidence of Japanese militarist aggression against China cannot be concealed. The erroneous move of the Japanese Education Ministry in distorting history is also intolerable.

Germ Warfare Viewed

[Text] Beijing, August 14 (XINHUA) -- Bai Xiqing, president of the Chinese Medical Association, reacting to the recent Japanese textbook distortion, today recounted Japanese germ warfare and experimentation in China between 1935 and 1945. A leading Chinese pathologist, Bai Xiqing, who worked as deputy head of public health of the northeast people's government from 1947 to 1954, said the Japanese No. 731 unit conducted bacteriological experiments in Harbin's Pingfang District. When they surrendered on August 15, 1945, the Japanese aggressors demolished a bacteria factory in this district. The escape of plague-infected mice from the factory caused the deaths of more than 40 people.

The Japanese unit employed more than 2,000 people in bacteria research and production. Innocent Chinese civilians were arrested, including pregnant women and infants, for experimental purposes.

The Far East military tribunal in Tokyo found that during the 10-year period, more than 3,000 Chinese, Koreans, and Russians were used by the Japanese unit as experimental subjects. Some received injections of plague, anthrax, cholera and syphilis bacteria, while others were tied and shot with bacteria shells and bullets. Still others were fed poisoned drink and food and some were experimented with frostbites.

Between 1940 and 1944, Bai Xiqing said, Japanese aircraft dropped plague bacteria in Zhejiang, Hebei, Henan, Shanxi, Hunan and Shandong Provinces.

Such horrors cannot be forgotten, Bai Xiqing said. The Japanese people should be told the truth so that they will join hands with the Chinese people in preventing the recurrence of such tragedy, he concluded.

RED CROSS LEADER MEETS JAPANESE DELEGATION

OW071828 Beijing XINHUA in English 1501 GMT 7 Aug 82

The reservoir, known as Sagami Lake, was built during the Japanese war of aggression against China for providing electric power to its military industry in Yokohama. According to the delegation, Japanese militarists took 289 laborers from China and forced them to do the most difficult and most dangerous work at the construction site. As a result, 28 of them died, together with over 50 Korean and Japanese laborers.

Noriaka Sugimoto, leader of the delegation, told Yang Chun that to cherish friendship between China and Japan, residents around the reservoir have organized a committee in commemoration of the dead. The committee has collected much information about the dead and given considerable publicity. Four ceremonies have been held in commemoration of the dead and a monument built in their honor The delegation has come to China to collect more information about the dead Chinese laborers, he said.

Noriaki Sugimoto said that the monument stands on a busy highway near the reservoir so that one million visitors can see it every year. "We believe this monument will contribute to the friendship between the people of Japan and China," he said. "However," he continued, "our work is not yet over. We have failed to have the names of the dead Chinese and Korean laborers on the monument owing to the influence of militarist forces and the interference and objection of some people. We will continue our struggle until all their names are put down on the monument."

On behalf of the Chinese Red Cross Society, Yang Chun thanked the Japanese friends for their efforts. "Your struggle is justified and the just cause can never be suppressed. Some people attempt to cover up the Japanese militarists criminal acts of aggression in China, slaughtering Chinese people and persecuting Chinese laborers. But they all never succeed and will inevitably meet with the common opposition from the Japanese and Chinese people," he said.

[Text] Bangkok, August 16 (XINHUA) -- Vietnamese occupation troops in Kampuchea have recently kept up their attacks on the Kampuchean resistance forces in western Kampuchea and fired dozens of rocket and mortar shells into Thailand. The NATION REVIEW today reported a Vietnamese attack on a group of Kampuchean villagers near a jungle camp of the Khmer People's National Liberation Front (KPNLF) led by Son Sann over the weekend. Seven women were killed and many others wounded.

The Thai Supreme Command reported that fighting between Kampuchean resistance forces and the Vietnamese troops escalated along the border area opposite Sisaket Province on August 11. During the clash, a Thai village at Kantharak District of the province was partly damaged when a number of artillery shells were fired by the Vietnamese from the other side of the border. Further south in Prachin Buri Province, over 60 Vietnamese rocket and mortar shells were slammed into three Thai villages the same day. Some houses and crops were destroyed.

A military spokesman said that the fighting and shelling showed that the Vietnamese troops still kept their military hardwares near the Kampuchean-Thai border.

This gives the lie to Vietnamese Foreign Minister Nguyen Co Thach's statement that Vietnam wanted to have peace in the area and would withdraw its troops from the Kampuchea-Thai border. Meanwhile, military sources at the border said about 300 soldiers of the Hanoi-backed Heng Samrin regime last week defected to a Sihanoukist force based at Ban Non Chan opposite the Thai district of Aranyaprathet.

THAILAND REJECTS SRV REQUEST FOR PLANE WRECKAGE

[Text] Bangkok, August 9 (XINHUA) -- Thailand has rejected Vietnam's request to fly back the wreckage of its Soviet-made transport plane which violated the Thai airspace and crash-landed into the Thai border province of Prachin Buri last February, today's NATION REVIEW quoted a spokesman of the Supreme Command of the Royal Thai Armed Forces as saying yesterday.

The spokesman, Lt. Gen. Som Kattaphan, said the Thai Government agreed that the Vietnamese aircraft would be returned to Vietnam and its wreckage had already been moved to U-Taphao in Sattahip to wait for Vietnamese officials to take it back by ship. However, Lt. Gen. Som said, Vietnam wanted its military plane to fly into Thailand to take back the remains of the plane. But "we will not allow another violation of Thai airspace."

The navigator of the Vietnamese plane, Antonov-26, was killed in the crash-landing on Thai soil while 12 other Vietnamese airmen on board were detained by the Thai authorities. The 12 Vietnamese were later set free and returned to their homeland following an apology for the incident by Vietnam.

WEST EUROPE ECONOMIC PROSPECTS SAID DIM

[Text] Beijing, August 12 (XINHUA correspondent) -- The lingering economic recession in West European nations has entered its third year with no apparent pick-up signs and the future is still shrouded in uncertainty. Industrial production in the EEC nations continued its downward trend or stood at a standstill in the first half of this year after a 2.5 percent drop last year. Although there was a recovery in some countries, it appeared weak and unstable.

In Britain, there has been a slight rise in the industrial production index since last March as a result of greater North Sea oil production. But for most industrial sectors, the recession persists. The confederation of British Industry, in a recent survey, indicated that 50 percent of the 1,657 corporations under survey did not get enough orders and one third of these corporations were going to cut down their investments in machinery and equipment. The lingering recession has seriously eroded the conviction in business and industrial circles.

In West Germany, a total of 5,676 business bankruptcies were reported in the first half of this year, an increase of 50 percent over the same period of last year. The West German Government predicts a real one percent economic growth for this year but the figure is described as "too optimistic" by economic experts. In their view, West German economy will not improve this year and there will be more bankruptcies. The French journal NOUVEAU carried on August 6 an article by its Bonn correspondent saying that a total of 14,000 to 16,000 enterprises in that country would have to submit their balance sheets to the court and serious bankruptcies have come to pass one on top of the other.

In France, there had been a pick-up last winter as a result of the government's stimulative policies which differ from those adopted in Britain and the United States. The French Government hoped for a 3.3 percent economic growth this year. But, faced with a 13.3 percent rise of consumer prices in the first half of this year, the French Government was compelled to announce a four-month freeze on wages and prices in mid-June. This move may slow inflation down to about 11 percent this year, but the cost will involve the disappearance of the already waning recovery.

Elsewhere in Europe, the same picture is true of Italy, the Netherlands and Belgium.

The economic recession and massive bankruptcies have rendered unemployment more serious. The unemployment rate in the 10 EEC nations jumped to 9.1 percent last June from 7.4 percent in the same month of last year. The number of jobless increased, from 8.5 million to 10.37 million, an increase of 22 percent within one year. In Britain, the number of jobless remains at the level of three million since the beginning of this year. In West Germany, the number of unemployed rose to 1.65 million last June from 1.125 million a year ago, showing a 46 percent increase within one year. Head of the Federal Labor Office predicted recently that the number of jobless in the country will top the two million mark in winter.

Many factors combine to make the current recession last this long. First, the high interest-rate policy of the West European nations has affected the fixed capital investment in enterprises and impeded recovery; second, domestic demands are not strong; and third, a shrinking international market limits exports. Statistics show that external trade accounts for some 20 percent in the EEC nations GNP, and therefore has a great bearing on their economic development.

Last year, Western Europe had a trade deficit of 13 billion U.S. dollars against the United States and 10.3 billion dollars against Japan. Tightly squeezed between the United States and Japan, Western Europe also encounters more and more barriers in its trade with the Soviet Union, Eastern Europe and the developing countries. All this defies an easy solution in the near future.

Late last year, six economists contributing to the U.S. weekly TIME predicted a pick-up in the second half of this year for Europe. But, when they met again in London last July, they had to agree that their hope had ended up in smoke. They pointed out that in the latter half of this year, the economic growth in Western Europe will slow down further and unemployment will continue to mount.

Zhao Hosts Banquet

[Text] Beijing, August 16 (ZINHUA) -- Premier Zhao Ziyang gave a banquet in the Great Hall of the People this evening for Jadallah 'Aziz at-Talhi, secretary of the General People's Committee of the Socialist People's Libyan Arab Jamahiriyah, and his party.

Zhao Ziyang praised the Libyan people for their achievements made under the leadership of Colonel Mu'ammar al-Qadhdhafi in safeguarding national independence and sovereignty, developing the national economy and raising their cultural level and living standard. He also admired Libya's policy of anti-imperialism, anti-colonialism, and nonalignment, its support of the Palestinian and Arab people in their struggle to fight against Israeli aggression and recover their national rights, and its support of the cause of the people of southern Africa for liberation.

The premier said: "The Chinese Government and people treasure the friendly relations of cooperation between our two countries, and sincerely hope to see the furtherance of such relations." He said he believed At-Talhi's visit would contribute to the nation's friendship and cooperation.

Speaking on the Middle East situation, he said: "The Chinese Government and people strongly denounce Israel for trampling on the principles of international law and disregarding United Nations resolutions. The Israelis have launched an inhuman war against the Lebanese and Palestinian peoples. We resolutely support the Lebanese and Palestinian armed forces and peoples in their just struggle against Israeli aggression.

"The Palestinian question is the core of the Middle East issue. Owing to Israel aggression and the contention between the two superpowers, the question cannot be solved over a long time.

The Chinese Government maintains that Israel must withdraw from Arab territories, including Jerusalem, occupied since 1967, and the national rights of the Palestinian people must be restored, including the right to return to their homeland, the right to self-determination and the right to establish a state. Although the Palestinian resistance movement has suffered heavy blows and loss in life, the cause of struggle of the Palestinian people is just and invincible. We are convinced that with the sympathy and support of the world's people, the Palestinian and other Arab peoples, united and helping one another in the fight against the common enemy, will eventually realize their lofty national goal. The Middle East issue will be completely and justly solved on the basis of respect for the national rights of the Palestinian people and the sovereignty and territorial integrity of all Arab countries," he said.

In his speech, At-Talhi condemned Israeli Zionism for its barbarous invasion of Lebanon with the support of the United States. He said that such aggression reflected the U.S. attempt to force the Arab nations to bend and surrender, and to push its hegemonist ambition in this region.

At-Talhi said: "Offering money and weapons, the U.S. has created in Israel an entity for sabotage and massacre in Palestine and Lebanon with the aim of paving the way for the creation of more entities in other regions in similar fashion. However, no matter how cunning the imperialists' tricks and how advanced their weapons, we firmly believe victory belongs to the people."

He said: "Libya attaches great importance to united actions among Third-World countries. We are sure that their political, economic and social aspirations depend on their cooperation and coordination to a great extent. Only by close cooperation and effective coordination can they overcome the obstacles in international relations."

He praised China for its resolute stand of support for the struggle of the peoples of all countries. "We admire your stand on Palestine, the principal issue for the Arab world. Your stand is based on nonrecognition of the consequences of plunder, and the effective support to the Palestinian people for the recovery of their territory and the establishment of their own state," he said.

Speaking of relations between Libya and China, he said, after the revolution, Libya established direct links with China aiming at establishing, strengthening and developing cooperation.

Present at the banquet where State Councillor and Minister of Foreign Economic Relations and Trade Chen Muhua, Minister of Light Industry Yang Bo, Minister of Communications Li Qing, Vice-Minister of Foreign Affairs Wen Yezhan, and leading members of other government departments, the Headquarters of the General Staff of the Chinese People's Liberation Army, the Beijing Municipal People's Government and the China Islamic Association. Also present was Abdallah A. al-Harari, secretary of the People's Committee of the Libyan People's Bureau in Beijing.

Prior to the banquet, Premier Zhao Ziyang had a friendly chat with At-Talhi and his party.

ISRAELI-LEBANESE EVACUATION ACCORD SAID NEAR

OW161654 Beijing XINHUA in English 1628 GMT 16 Aug 82

[Text] Beijing, August 16 (XINHUA) -- U.S. special envoy Philip Habib returned to Lebanon from Israel today hopeful of an agreement in a couple of days to evacuate Palestinian guerrillas from Beirut, according to reports reaching here today. Lebanese leaders were optimistic that the said final agreement would be concluded before the end of the week and the Palestine Liberation Organization guerrillas would start leaving west Beirut next Saturday, one report said.

Quoting Lebanon's state and privately owned radios, the report said Lebanese President Ilyas Sarkis, Prime Minister Shafiq Al-Wazzan and Foreign Minister Fu'ad Butrus were in conference in the hilltop presidential palace not far from Beirut, waiting for Habib to join them and convey the Israeli position.

Habib had two rounds of talks with Israeli Prime Minister Menachem Begin in Jerusalem yesterday in an atmosphere of "cautious optimism". Israeli Defense Minister Ari'el Sharon and Foreign Minister Yitzhaq Shamir were also present at the meetings. Meanwhile, the Israeli Cabinet had a three-hour meeting Sunday. It agreed on Lebanon's demand that the PLO guerrillas be evacuated simultaneously with the deployment of an American, French and Italian peacekeeping force in west Beirut, the reports said.

Israel also dropped its objection to the arrival of an advance French unit from the multinational force to be stationed in west Beirut on the day when the PLO begins leaving the city. The Israeli Cabinet dropped another previous demand that a list containing the names of all PLO guerrilla evacuees be handed to Israel in advance.

Israel radio said the Israeli Government had agreed to accept written pledges from the United States, France and Italy to withdraw their troops if the guerrillas refuse to move. But an Israeli Cabinet statement said an Israeli pilot captured by the PLO and the bodies of nine missing Israeli soldiers must be handed over to the International Red Cross before the PLO evacuates, one report said.

Another report, quoting radio Beirut today, said that the PLO and International Red Cross representatives made contact yesterday about freeing the captured Israeli pilot and returning the remains of the nine Israelis. The report quoted an Israeli Government spokesman as saying yesterday that the return of pilot Aharon Ahiaz and the remains of the nine missing soldiers would be a mandatory component of any Beirut settlement. It is also reported that Syria has agreed to evacuate its forces from Beirut to east Lebanon's Bekaa Valley simultaneously with the PLO's departure, and Israel has agreed to pull out its checkpoints from the Beirut-Damascus Highway.

[Text] Cairo, August 16 (XINHUA) -- Egypt is ready to accept wounded Palestinians who are in need of major surgery, announced Egyptian Deputy Premier and Foreign Minister Kamal Hasan 'Ali today, according to a MENA report. 'Ali added that the PLO called on Egypt to treat wounded Palestinians at Egypt's civilian and military hospitals and that Egypt has informed the PLO of its readiness to send a high level medical mission to Beirut to treat the injured.

During his meeting with the PLO delegation here today, 'Ali also affirmed that Egypt could not receive any Palestinian militants other than within the framework of a just and overall solution for the Palestinian cause affirming the legitimate rights of the Palestinian people including their right to self-determination.

MENA also reported Egypt has informed the United States that it would not think of resuming the autonomy negotiations before Israel's withdrawal from Lebanon.

The Egyptian position in this regard was disclosed by Foreign Minister Kamal Hasan 'Ali during his meeting yesterday with American Charge d'Affaires Henry Brecht. 'Ali said: "The negotiations cannot be resumed in the same way they were conducted in the past because Israel is emptying the Camp David agreements of their content by means of its interpretations.

"What we need is a clear definition of the meaning and arrangements of the transitional period" during which the Palestinians will be allowed to rule themselves, 'Ali added.

[Text] Beijing, August 16 (XINHUA) -- The Standing Committee of the National People's Congress gave a banquet in the Great Hall of the People this evening for a delegation from the Sudanese National People's Assembly led by Deputy Speaker Luigi Adok. Vice-Chairman Ulanhu of the N.P.C. Standing Committee presided. Prior to the banquet, he met with the guests. Referring to the Middle-East issue, Vice-Chairman Ulanhu said: "It was with U.S. abetment and support that Israel started the latest savage war of aggression against Lebanon. The Chinese Government and people strongly condemn the Israeli acts of aggression and expansion and the U.S. support to Israel. Israel must immediatley stop its aggression against Lebanon and withdraw unconditionally all its troops from Lebanon in compliance with the relevant resolutions of the UN Security Council."

He said: "We shall, as always, firmly support the just struggle of the Palestinian and other Arab peoples. We firmly believe that so long as the Arab countries uphold unity in their struggle against the common enemy, final victory will belong to the Palestinian and other Arab peoples."

MAO'S LETTERS TO FRIENDS, RELATIVES PUBLISHED

OW161556 Beijing XINHUA Domestic Service in Chinese 0221 GMT 16 Aug 82

[Text] Beijing, 16 Aug (XINHUA) -- Comrade Mao Zedong's five letters to his relatives and friends (written between May 1950 and June 1957).

Letter to Mao Yimin (footnote 1) (dated 8 May 1950):

Comrade Yimin: Your 3 January letter has been received. Thank you for your kindness and for telling me in detail about the situation in our home village. The poor people in the village live a hard life and the families of revolutionary martyrs live an even harder life. They must bear it at this time. After the land reform, things will improve somewhat. Then, the people's government will be able to give some aid to the people, such as providing loans for them. By that time the people will be able to gradually improve their livelihood.

Care for the families of revolutionary martyrs is a nationwide concern. There are millions of families of revolutionary martyrs throughout the country. Of course, it is inconvenient for the government to give special care to the families of revolutionary martyrs in only a few localities. However, the local government should give consideration to the people with the greatest difficulties when reducing rent on land and carrying out land reform and when the new crop is still in the blade and the old one has been consumed.

It is very good that you work in the home village. Thus, you can write to me often and tell me about the situation there.

Please give my best regards to the comrades in the village. I hope they will work hand and progress.

This is my reply to your letter. I wish you good health.

Mao Zedong, 8 May 1950

Letter to Wen Nansong (dated 12 May 1950):

Cousin Nansong: Your letter has been received. Thank you for your kindness. Brother Yunchang (footnote 2) wrote me several letters and I sent him a reply which was mailed to the address in Baibangkou, Nanxian County. I do not know if he has received the letter. It is improper for me to recommend brother Yunchang for a job. He should acquit himself well among the people to win their trust. Then, he will have an opportunity to participate in work. Are our 10th and 17th elder brothers still alive? I am greatly relieved to learn that our 11th elder brother is still alive and healthy. He has written to me and I have sent him a letter in reply. I do not know if he has received the letter. In your letter you said that there was a food shortage in the village, but the government refused to provide food grain. How are things now? Is there still a food shortage? Has the government done anything about it? Please write to me and tell me in detail about the situation.

This is my reply to your letter. I wish you well.

Letter to Li Shuqing (footnote 3) (dated 16 October 1952):

Mr Shuqing: Your letter has been received. I am delighted that you told me about the situation in the home village. I am willing to collect information on local matters for reference only; I am unwilling to directly handle general local matters and should not do so. Otherwise, it would be inconvenient for local party and government organizations to handle matters. I hope you will excuse me. I avail myself of this opportunity to extend my respects to you.

Mao Zedong, 16 October 1952

Letter to the Shicheng village party branch and government (dated 29 April 1954):

Comrades of the Shicheng village party branch and government: Comrade Mao Yueqiu (footnote 4) brought me your report when he came to Beijing. Many thanks.

The Wen family of Tangjiatuo are my relatives. In the past several years, they visited me often in Beijing. Since their return to Tangjiatuo, some of them have become arrogant and not very cooperative with the government. This is wrong. Any member of the Wen family, like others in the village, should obey the leadership of the party and the government, farm diligently, and abide by the law and should not be treated differently. Please do not hesitate to subject them to discipline just because they are my relations. My attitude is:

1. I love them because they are working people and my relatives.

2. Because I love them, I hope they progress, farm diligently, abide by the law and participate in the mutual aid cooperative organization like everyone else. They should not enjoy any special privileges. They should be criticized if they show backward behavior. Do not hesitate to criticize their shortcomings and mistakes just because they are my relatives.

Enclosed is a letter from Comrade Wen Bingzhang (footnote 5) for your perusal. I agree with Comrade Wen Bingzhang. Please handle what me mentioned. Also, please let those in Stangjiatuo read my letter and Wen Bingzhang's letter, and help them correct their shortcomings and mistakes. I believe that as long as you and I assume a correct attitude and as long as they do not stubbornly adhere to their opinions, they can correct their shortcomings and mistakes and progress.

With comradely regards,

Mao Zedong, 29 April 1954

Letter to Sun Peijun (footnote 6) (dated 8 June 1957):

Comrade Peijun: Your 16 May letter was received. I am glad that you have graduated from junior middle school. It is inappropriate for me to write to the school regarding your admission. The school should decide whether you passed the examination and have been selected. If you are not admitted to the school of higher grade, you may review your lessons at home. Enclosed is 300 yuan for your mother. I will send you more money later. Do not worry.

Mao Zedong, 8 June 1957

HONGQI Commentary

OW161522 Beijing XINHUA in English 1504 GMT 16 Aug 82

[Text] Beijing, August 16 (XINHUA) -- Five letters written by late Chairman Mao Zedong to his relatives from 1950 to 1957 are carried in the bimonthly RED FLAG (HONGQI) published today. In these letters, Mao Zedong emphasized that he could not take advantage of his power to seek private gain and preference for his relatives and hometown.

The journal issued a commentary on the letters entitled "Properly Using Power Entrusted by the People.

The commentary says: "These letters raise a serious quesion: How should the cadres of the party in power use the power the people entrusted to them properly; should they seek private gain for themselves or a few people, or work for the interests of the masses of the people? An important matter is how to treat their relatives."

The commentary says that the principles expounded in Mao Zedong's five letters can be summarized into the following three points:

1. Mao Zedong was very glad to hear from his relatives and friends about his "hometown situation." He hoped that they would always write to him, telling him such news. Mao Zedong politely declined their request that he throw in a word or two about his hometown so as directly to help solve some problems. He said that he would not, and indeed should not, directly handle local problems of a general nature because that would embarrass the local party committee and government.

2. To those relatives and friends who asked for help in finding jobs or admission to school, Mao Zedong wrote politely declining, and furthermore tried to educate them patiently.

3. He advised the party branch and government of Shicheng township to supervise and educate his relatives and "not to feel awkward or balk at criticizing their shortcomings, mistakes and backwardness because they are my relatives." He said that he hoped his relatives would be treated exactly the same as the masses and would not be given any preference.

The commentary says: "Not using one's office to seek personal gain for his relatives and friends is a principle determined by the nature of our party. Ours is a political party of the proletariat, which seeks the interests of the majority of the people. Every party member, especially every cadre, has the duty of serving the people whole-heartedly, and no priveleges."

The commentary says, because the party style of work suffered serious damage at the hands of the Lin Biao and Jiang Quing counter-revolutionary cliquest during the decade of turmoil, their pernicious influence has not yet been totally eliminated. Some cadres have taken advantage of their position and power to solve the problems of school enrollment or employment for their relatives or friends. It criticizes such practices and says that these people should learn something from Mao Zedong's letters.

The commentary says Mao Zedong set strict demands on his relatives and friends and asked them not to seek privileges. So did many other veteran proletarian revolutionairies like Zhou Enlai, Liu Shaoqi and Zhu De and the majority of the thousands upon thousands of high and middle ranking officials and grassroots cadres. Thus they won the trust and admiration of the people.

SHANDONG URGES IMPROVEMENT OF WHEAT SOWING

SK090824 Jinan Shandong Provincial Service in Mandarin 2300 GMT 8 Aug 82

[Text] According to our sources, Shandong Province recently sponsored a forum in Jinan Municipality on wheat production to analyze the wheat production situation this year, to sum up lessons and experience gained in adopting technical measures and conducting field management and to discuss ways to do a good job in carrying out autumn sowing this year.

Despite the sustained drought and heat this year which have caused production losses on a fairly large scale, the province has still reaped a rather good wheat harvest thanks to vigorous efforts exerted by the party committees and the people's governments at all levels and by the broad masses of cadres and the people, the wheat output is much better than we had expected.

Of 123 counties, municipalities and prefectures in the province, over 40 percent scored an output increase over the 1981 figure. There are over a dozen counties which have scored over a 30-million-jin increase and over 20 counties which have scored over a 100-jin increase in their per-mu-field figures. Pingyuan, Binxian and Gaotang Counties have scored a remarkable increase.

In addition to the fundamental reason why our province has reaped such a good wheat harvest this year -- the party's leadership, line, principles and policies have brought into play the enthusiasm of cadres and the masses --there are also the following experiences gained in the production itself:

1. Sustained efforts have been made to launch a struggle against the drought and tap water sources and dams to expand irrigated acreage and improve irrigation efficiency.

2. Efforts have been made to increase fertilizer volume and improve fertilizer application methods to improve efficiency.

3. Efforts have been made to make rational arrangements for wheat strains suitable to specific areas to improve strain efficiency.

4. Efforts have been made to carry out deep plowing and careful harrowing to conserve fertilizer.

5. Efforts have been made to strengthen technical guidance and upgrade the standard of scientific field management.

The forum noted: Although our province has accumulated abundant experience in wheat production, there are still some problems. Although our failure to fulfill the summer grain production plan this year was caused by the drought and natural disasters, problems such as the excess reduction of planted area, extremely late wheat sowing -- after the cold dew period -- which accounted for a third of the total wheat planted area, and improper field management for late wheat seedling growth all adversely affected wheat output.

By drawing lessons from such problems, the forum emphatically discussed ways to improve wheat production technology and field management to strive to perfect autumn wheat sowing this year.

GUANGDONG GOVERNOR ON DEVELOPING FOREIGN TRADE

[Excerpts] Guangdong, 12 Aug (XINHUA) -- Governor Liu Tianfu of Guangdong recently told a XINHUA reporter that full use must continue to be made of Guangdong's favorable conditions to vigorously develop activities in foreign trade such as the processing and assembling of products with materials, semifinished products or specifications provided by foreign businessmen.

Governor Liu Tianfu made this remark when he answered the reporter's questions on foreign trade activities in Guangdong. He said: Our open-door policy in economic affairs is firm. We will not change this policy. We will exert even greater efforts in developing various activities in foreign trade such as the processing and assembling of products with materials, semifinished products or specifications provided by foreign businessmen because there are many favorable conditions in Guangdong in this regard.

Reviewing the past achievements, Governor Liu Tianfu said: Since the implementation of the special policy and the flexible measures in Guangdong in 1979, rapid developments have been made in the processing and assembling of products with materials, semifinished products or specifications provided by foreign businessmen. Currently, more than 60 counties and municipalities have carried out work in this connection and signed over 13,000 contracts; over 8,000 have been executed. Some of them involve the processing and assembling of products from materials provided from abroad in light industry and in textiles, electronics, machine-building and construction materials fields. Our experience in the past 3 years indicates that the situation in developing such activities in foreign trade is fine. We are able to fulfill almost all the contracts on time. Both we and the foreign businessmen have reaped benefits.

Governor Liu Tianfu said in conclusion: At present, we must do a good job in summing up our experience in this regard, firmly adhere to our policy, abide by the contracts, keep our word and eliminate apprehension among Hong Kong and foreign businessmen. At the same time, we must also strengthen our management and do an even better and faster job in processing and assembling products from materials provided from abroad.

"Generally speaking the province's industrial situation was good in the first half of the year. Total value of industrial output represented 49.3 percent of the year's plan and was 12.7 percent over the corresponding period of last year. Labor productivity rose by 7.3 percent. Revenue from sales rose by 13.5 percent and profit by 12.7 percent. Economic returns have improved all the more in enterprises that have been straightened out.

"However, the conference pointed out, we must not overestimate our success in correcting the guiding ideology for industrial production and straightening out the enterprises. We still lag very far behind certain progressive units throughout the country. The development of our work is very uneven. There are many problems that need solving."

Li Qingwei, secretary of the provincial CPC committee and vice governor, delivered a summation. He pointed out: "The most important thing in straightening out the enterprises is to overcome weaknesses in leadership.

The leaders at all levels must be resolved to solve the main problems and sharp contradictions in the enterprises. First, it is necessary to solve the problems of the leadership groups· second, we must solve the problem of labor organization; third, it is necessary to learn from the experiences of the capital iron and steel company and straighten out and perfect the economic responsibility systems."

He said: "The principal leading comrades of the provincial organs and the prefectures and municipalities must personally grasp one or two key enterprises. The leadership groups of 70 key provincial, prefectural and municipal enterprises must be rectified before the end of September, and we must ensure that every enterprise leadership group has several able men. It is necessary to solve the problems of laxness, weakness, overstaffing, aging, and failure to understand professional matters. The provincial CPC committee has decided to set up an office for the leadership group for straightening out industrial and communications enterprises. All prefectures and municipalities must also strengthen their administrative organs for straightening out the enterprises."

HK170404 Shijizhuang Hebei Provincial Service in Mandarin 0400 GMT 11 Aug 82

The meeting pointed out: Economic crime is rather rampant in Hebei. This is a major expression of the class struggle in the new historical conditions. It has already corrupted and is now corrupting our cadre force, harming the body of the party, government and army and the prestige of the state, poisoning people's thinking, polluting the social atmosphere, sabotaging economic construction and affecting social stability. Hence, striking at all kinds of economic crimes remains a major task of the procuratorial organs at all levels now and for a long time to come.

The meeting demanded that political and legal organs at all levels in the province make still greater efforts and continue to deal resolute blows at all kinds of serious economic crimes. It is necessary to unswervingly carry through to the end this struggle, which is related to the future and destiny of the state, to ensure the correct implementation of the policy of opening up to the world and enlivening the domestic economy, and also the smooth progress of the four modernizations drive in the province.

The meeting unanimously adopted a resolution on launching in depth the struggle against serious economic crime. During the meeting the committee members seriously studied the communique of the 7th Plenary Session of the 11th Central Committee. The meeting called on the people throughout the province to greet the 12th party congress with practical deeds of promoting production and work.

HEBEI RIBAO URGES OBSERVING DISCIPLINE

[Commentator's article: "Strive To Be A Model in Observing Discipline"]

[Text] Observing discipline is an important aspect in spiritual civilization and a manifestation of idealism and morality. Strengthening discipline is an organizational guarantee for building spiritual civilization. By discipline, we mean party discipline and administrative and work discipline; and political discipline and economic and work style discipline as well. Maintaining political unity with the Central Committee is a discipline the whole party should follow. The rules and regulations and pledges drawn up by various units are also a discipline. Discipline permeates all aspects of our political and social life. As a result it forms into a huge network of people systematically participating in social activities. Without discipline, the administration of our socity will be in a state of chaos and the phenomenon of "collision" in our social life may happen at any time. Clearly defining discipline in all respects and strictly applying it has become a basic need in our social life. However, there are some people who have not paid due attention to the importance of maintaining and observing discipline; they still lack a sense of discipline in their minds. From the reflection of the problems in our daily life, there are mainly the following 10 kinds of problems.

1. People have a doubting attitude toward the party's line, principles and policy. They have knots in their minds, hesitate in their actions and deal passively with their work. Although this type is exceptional, they still exist.

2. People ignore state law and party discipline and take advantage of their power to seek personal benefits. Some engage in unhealthy tendencies under the pretext of serving the public. Some make no distinction between public and private, but regard public property as their private possessions. Some individuals take advantage of their work to establish relationships, accept gifts and take bribes. In this way they entrap the state and line their own pockets.

3. People reverse the relationship between the individual and the organization and do not obey the assignment, transfer and arrangement of work by the organizations. Some pick up posts according to their own personal interests. If personal desires are not fulfilled, they do not accept the assignment of the organizations. Some even regard the solving of housing, children and spouse problems as conditions, to put pressure on the organization. When they fail in their pressure, they then make trouble, or sue someone, or jabber, or dawdle, or plead illness and fail to be on duty for a long time.

4. Discarding organizational principles, people hanker after individual's dependence. Some regard the work assigned by the organization as their own spheres of influence and the appointment of cadres as their own private matter. They look after their relationships and exchange flattery and favors. They try by every means to employ those cadres who should not be appointed and refuse to accept those cadres who should be employed. When some cadres are examined on their mistakes, they play tricks from the top to the bottom, plead for mercy or shield their faults with sweet talk or even publicly defend them. In their work, they go half by policy and half by human favor. Sometimes nothing gets done by following the policy and principle and proceeding in accordance with organizational system, but when depending on personal relationships and favor, everything is smoothly accomplished, even if it does not conform to the policy.

5. People disregard the organization and despise discipline. Some ignore confidential discipline, leak in advance information on appointments and removals and transfers and punishment of cadres by the party organizations. Before it is made into a decision, it is already known to all. Some resist criticism from the higher level and suppress criticism from the lower level. As to those who criticize, they pin political labels on them and make things hard for them.

6. The lower levels do not submit to the higher level and the minority do not submit to the majority. As to the decisions and suggestions of the higher level, they either use soft tactics to shift the responsibility onto others or refuse to act at all, or adopt an attitude of pragmatism. They take care of work favorable to them and ignore and forget the unfavorable, and sometimes even practice fraud to deceive the leadership. They do not observe and implement decisions approved by the collective, using the excuse "I did not agree."

7. People defy the policy, decrees and regulations of the party and government, and do not observe social morality. Some do not implement the policy of family planing, and some support their relatives in seizing and grabbing spaces for building houses. They organize lavish weddings and funerals, give dinners and send gifts. Some even participate in superstitious activities. They do not observe the management system of the organs, but seize more room to expand their own courtyard.

8. People do not observe working regulations. They presumptuously leave their posts while on duty and come and go as they please. They stay away from work without any reason, do not ask for leave, and do not report back after leave of absence, or exceed the time limit and fail to return. Some prefer light jobs to heavy ones. They do not go to the countryside or party schools nor do they attend meetings and study documents and newspapers.

They are really "muddlers." Even worse is that they don't work hard and engage in some other business at home to get extra income.

9. They do not use brains and efforts at work but divert their energy to dishonest practices. They prick up their ears to hearsay and rack their brains to analyze the "interior trends" of cadres. They try by every means to speculate and secure personal gains. Some try to sow discord among comrades, create trouble and make the relationships between one another more tense.

10. People lack necessary systems and do not strictly implement discipline. Up to now, some units do not have a set of normal working systems and do not have strict discipline demands either. The weakness of leadership causes the abnormal result of those who do not observe discipline running wild without hindrance, while those observing it are isolated and mocked.

Our party was famous in the world for its iron discipline. Why is it that there exists the phenomena of no sense of organization and nonobservance of discipline? One reason is the negative results of the "Cultural Revolution" that have not been thoroughly eliminated. Its pernicious influence is still affecting the minds of some of our people. The second is that the ideology, organization and the style of work of our party is not pure. Some comrades do not pay attention to remolding their world outlook. They have joined the party organizationally but not ideologically, and therefore they are easily influenced by anarchism. These anarchist ideas have also invaded the party through these people. In particular, those party members who joined the party during the "Cultural Revolution" are not used to the strict political life in the party, they lack tempering in party spirit and do not understand the organizational principles of the party. The third reason is these people cannot adapt themselves to the current historical transformation carried out in our country. Our party and country have reformed the past abnormal way of political life and strengthened the democratic life of the people. These people thought that the stress on people's democratic power meant they could free themselves from the party leadership. They demanded democracy, not centralism, and freedom, not discipline. This has developed the trend of extreme democracy. Since we practiced a policy of opening up to the outside world, due to a lack of vigilance, some of our comrades have been corroded ideologically by the invasion of capitalist ideas and bourgeois liberalization trends. The fourth reason is that political and ideological work cannot keep abreast of the development of the current situation. Since we criticized the method of "leftist" ideological work in the ideological field, some of our comrades have felt quite helpless and dared not provide bold leadership. They failed to grasp the task of the remolding of party cadres' world outlook and slackened their efforts in the ideological struggle between the proletariat and capitalism. This is becaure we have not worked enough at education in communist idealism and morality. The fifth reason is that as leadership is lax and weak, it fails to strictly implement discipline. In some cases there is lack of unity in leadership, while some who are leaders themselves do not observe discipline and therefore have no right to criticize other people. Some dare not criticize and control people who have violated discipline, since they fear offending people. The crux of the matter in these five aspects, Whether historical or practical, is the leadership. As leaders, we can neither make excessive demands on history nor demand perfection of reality. We cannot have illusions that there are no contradictions and problems in our actual society. Under the general prerequisite of objective reality, whether we dare to solve problems or are lax and weak and withdraw when we encounter difficulties; whether we strengthen discipline and concert our actions or let things drift and get into a state of disunity; whether we march forward together to the great objective of building the four modernizations or depart from this great objective and each go his own way; the solution is in adopting the former options and not the latter. The accomplishment of this solution depends on the leadership work at various levels. Can we be unconcerned about the sabotage of the party's unified centralism? Can we allow the phenomena of nonorganization and nondiscipline to harm our four modernization cause? No: We certainly cannot: We must strenghten and rectify party discipline and persevere in the struggle against those who violate discipline.

The rectification and strengthening of party discipline is determined by the nature of our party. Our party is the vanguard of the proletariat.

In order to keep the body of our party healthy and allow it to accomplish its lofty historical task, we need all the party members and the broad masses of people united around the party relying on the strength of the organization and the binding of discipline to resist the corrosion and influence of capitalist ideology. Just as Lenin pointed out: Only by practicing strict centralism and discipline within the proletarian political party, can we resist evil influences and let the proletariat correctly, effectively and victoriously exert their organizational role. A party member or a cadre who falls captive to the bourgeoisie usually does so because of a blunt sense of organization and lax discipline. Maintaining the party's fighting power inevitably demands that we strengthen and rectify party discipline. Comrade Liu Shaoqi said: "Our party is not a federation." Our party is an organ with a high degree of unity and unification within itself. The party's fighting strength is manifested through its unity and unification, and this unity and unification is dependant upon discipline. Those who violate discipline do not understand this principle. They regard the party as a federation, and are not bound by discipline, but persist in their old ways and do as they please. They cannot possibly lead to ideological consistency and coordinated action, and will harm the unity of the party and weaken the fighting power of the party.

Rectifying and strengthening party discipline are a reliable guarantee for the further advance of our construction of the socialist cause and therefore a desire and demand of the broad masses of people. Socialist discipline is different in essence to the discipline of all exploiting class societies in the past. "The social labor organization of the slave system is maintained with club discipline," "the social labor organization of the capitalist society is maintained with hunger discipline," while the labor organization of the socialist society "is maintained with the discipline of freedom and consciousness of the laboring masses themselves." The more our work advances, and the more society develops, the more we need to rely on this conscious discipline. The reason why the broad masses of people demand socialist discipline is that in our coutry the broad masses are the masters. The people wish to have a healthy and orderly social environment so that they can live and work in a steady way. Therefore, socialist discipline is conscious discipline, it is in essence, the norm and the binding for the behavior of the people themselves for their own interests. To safeguard this discipline is to maintain the fundamental interests of the people and to violate it means to harm the fundamental interests of the people.

At present, it is extremely necessary to conduct discipline education and rectification among the broad masses of cadres and party members.

Only by rectifying discipline, strengthening the sense of discipline in all of us, raising the consciousness of observing discipline and establishing a revolutionary force which can carry out work with high spirit, concerted action, strict enforcement of orders and prohibitions and good order, and is diligent in work and highly effective, can we initiate a new situation in all our work and ensure that the building of material and spiritual civilization can develop in depth.

QIANG XIAOCHU'S SPEECH AT JILIN PARTY SCHOOL

SK170617 Changchun Jilin Provincial Service in Mandarin 1100 GMT 16 Aug 82

He said: Marxism-Leninism-Mao Zedong Thought was, is and will be the basic guiding ideology of the party and the people. It is our most precious spiritual wealth and a cherished tradition. Therefore, the work on strengthening Marxist ideology and theory is the most fundamental and central issue in the constriction of socialist spiritual civilization. The belief of us members of the Communist Party of China is Marxism-Lennism-Mao Zedong Thought. The implementation of communism is our ideal and a spiritual pillar.

As far as politics and ideology are concerned, the construction of the socialist spiritual civilization means to adhere to and develop the scientific ideological system of Marxism-Leninism-Mao Zedong Thought.

At present, two prominent problems should be taken seriously and conscientiously studied. First, we should pay close attention to educating or reeducating cadres systematically with Marxism. This is a matter of fundamental importance and a pressing task. We should regard it as a basic task in the construction of the socialist spiritual civilization and conscientiously attend to it. Second, we should train and educate the youth to bring up new generations. We should attach primary importance to solving the problems in the outlook on life if we are to educate and bring up a new generation. Our outlook on life governs and guides our character, speech, actions and morality. One's outlook on life is shaped by way of inculcation, not spontaneous tendency. Inculcation means education. In order to help the people foster a revolutionary outlook on life, we should educate them with Marxism-Leninism-Mao Zedong Thought. We should seize all chance in our daily life to educate and cultivate people with communist spirit and morality and help them foster, step by step, a firm world outlook of dialectical materialism and historical materialism to enable them to strongly resist and criticize the various nonproletarian ideologies. This is a basic task in the construction of the socialist spiritual civilization.

It is not easy to construct the socialist spiritual civilization because the socialist society was born out of the old society and the ideology of the exploiting class left by the old society and the vestiges of the old traditional ideology and habits remain. As our contacts with the outside world expand, the bourgeois decadent ideology and living style are continuously exerting their corrosive influence. The modern bourgeois school of thought and the anti-Marxist trend of thought in the Western countries take various forms to [word indistinct] our ideological realm to corrode the people's ideology and to try to win the younger generation away from us. Therefore, the socialist communist ideological system could never be consolidated or developed without the criticism of the ideology and morality of the exploiting class and traditional forces and the struggles against the anti-Marxist ideology. We should take various effective measures with justice and a clear-cut stand to reinforce propaganda and education on Marxism-Leninism-Mao Zedong Thought to enhance the people's confidence to distinguish and resist the bourgeois ideologies.

On the other hand, our theoretical workers should put stress on the study of the bourgeois ideological trend of the Western countries, analyze and criticize it with Marxist principles and regard it as a negative example to help the people understand Marxism in comparison and criticism. It is our dutybound task to strengthen the people's belief in communism.

LIAONING USES FOREIGN FUNDS TO IMPORT EQUIPMENT

[Text] Dalian, August 13 (XINHUA) -- The port city of Dalian in coastal Liaoning Province has arranged to introduce 74 technical items from abroad in the coming four years for revamping its small and medium-sized enterprises through using foreign funds totalling 122 million yuan renminbi, officials from the city economic commission announced.

More than two thirds of the imported items are scheduled for the technical transformation of 61 enterprises of the light, textile, electronic, metallurgical and chemical industries and for improving quality and adding varieties.

Dalian, one of Chinas major coastal cities and foreign trade centers, has by its convenient location and port facilities an advantage in absorbing foreign investment. It has imported over 5,200 pieces of equipment since 1979 through loans, processing and assembling materials for foreign customers, compensatory trade, co-production and joint ventures. More than 80 enterprises, mostly consumer goods manufacturers and textile mills, have been upgraded. As a result, these enterprises are able to add 150 million yuan worth of exported goods annually with better quality.

Dalian jute mill, an old factory with obsolete equipment, has raised its annual output of 1,000 tons up to 5,000 tons, the officials said, since it improved 21 machines from Japan through compensatory trade in 1981.

To improve garment quality and increase production, the Dalian textile and apparel trade has imported more than 1,800 pieces of modern machinery with a total of 9.8 million U.S. dollars in recent years. Now the garments made in Dalian sell well on the international market.

LIAONING ENTERPRISE CONSOLIDATION MEETING HELD

[Excerpts] The provincial CPC committee and government convened the second provincial conference on enterprise consolidation in Anshan 6-10 August. The conference urged leading cadres at all levels to set high standards and strict demands on this work and to be daring in tackling tough problems. They should successfully settle the major contradictions of the enterprises and set the various tasks of the enterprises on the new path of economic development by the end of this year.

The conference emphatically pointed out: The consolidation and strengthening of leading bodies is the key to enterprise consolidation. We must note the serious state of affairs that leading cadres of enterprises are too old and successors are wanting. Genuine efforts should be made to alter the state of affairs in which the leading bodies are irresolute, dispirited weak, reluctant to offend others and unwilling to go further than doing some patch-up work. We should promote to leading bodies young and middle-aged cadres who support and implement the line adopted at the third plenary session and who are reasonable, creative, full of vigor and can make a breakthrough in work.

The conference pointed out: At present, there are two trends warranting our attention. The first is rushing for progress and impatience for sucess. The second is evading the principal contradictions and tough problems. These two trends could imperil the quality of enterprise consolidation. We must not attend to consolidating enterprises in a over-simple manner or merely go through the motions of it. Experiences of the Anshan Iron and Steel Company, (Laozitai) colliery under the Fushun mining administration, Shenyang mining equipment plant and 10 other units were introduced at the conference.

NINGXIA RIBAO ON REGION'S ECONOMIC SITUATION

HK290308 Yingchuan NINGXIA RIBAO in Chinese 19 Jul 82 p 1

[Report: "Region's Economic Situation in First Half of Year Was Good" -- capitalized passages denote boldface as published]

[Text] In the first half of the year, our region continued to implement the guiding principle of achieving further economic readjustment and political stability. All this widely increased industrial and commercial tax revenues, promoted withdrawal of currency from circulation and expanded foreign exchange income.

INCREASES IN INDUSTRIAL AND COMMERCIAL TAX REVENUES During the first half of the year, the whole region fulfilled 52 percent of the planned target for total industrial output value, an increase of more than 12 percent over same period last year. Heavy industry showed a marked increase again. Therefore, tax revenues from important industrial items such as electrical power, machinery, chemistry, rubber and so forth increased by a wide margin over same period last year. With the further enlivening of the market, tax revenues from commercial retail sales also increase considerably. During the first half of the year, our regions fulfilled more than 54 percent of the quotas set in the plan for tax revenues from industry and commerce, an increase of 15 percent over same period last year. More than 50 percent of the planned targets were attained within 6 months.

ACCELERATING WITHDRAWAL OF CURRENCY FROM CIRCULATION During the first half of this year, our region conscientiously implemented the "circular on grasping firmly and well the work of withdrawing currency from circulation and strictly controlling currency circulation" issued by the State Council, and exerted efforts to increase production, promote commodity circulation and enhance savings deposits. Therefore, we achieved marked results in withdrawing currency. In the first half of the year, the amount of cash incomes exceeded cash expenses and the net total of currency withdrawn from circulation increased by 15.2 percent over same period last year. The amount of currency withdrawn through selling commodities increased by 18.9 percent over same period last year and the net increase of savings deposits in banks and credit cooperatives increased by more than 32 million yuan, an increase of 10.057 million yuan over same period last year. The amount of fixed deposits accounted for more than 80 percent of the savings deposits.

While grasping the work of withdrawing currency from circulation, various localities have paid attention to controlling unreasonable currency circulation. As a result of our efforts to exercise control over distribution of bonuses, the amount of bonuses issued during the first half of the year dropped. This slowed down currency circulation.

ENORMOUS INCREASE IN FOREIGN EXCHANGE INCOMES During the first half of the year, foreign exchange in our region increased by 53 percent over same period last year.

Foreign exchange gained from export trade accounted for more than 90 percent of foreign exchange income. Noncommercial foreign exchange income came second. During the first half of the year, the region attained 93 percent of the targets of noncommercial foreign exchange income set in this year's plan, an increase of more than 100 percent over same period last year. As far as overseas remittances are concerned, there was an increase of more than 110 remittances with the largest single remittance exceeding $10,000.

SK100221 Xining Qinghai Provincial Service in Mandarin 1100 GMT 8 Aug 82

[Excerpts] The 5th provincial people's congress held its 19th session in Xining 3-7 August. The meeting discussed and adopted the provisional regulations on handling arbitrary or covert price increases, the additional regulations of the PRC's marriage law to be implemented in Huangnan Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture and Henan Mongolian Autonomous County, and a report on the appointment and removal of personnel.

The meeting also heard reports by the provincial people's government on the production situation in industry and communications in the first half of this year and on environmental protection work and the production safety situation.

Zhaxi Wangqug, chairman of the provincial people's congress standing committee, delivered a speech at the conclusion of the session. He said: The production situation in the first half of this year was fairly good. However, we must never be unrealistically optimistic. We must view the existing problems soberly. The tasks for the second half of the year are still arduous. Therefore, we must conscientiously implement the provincial government's arrangements for industrial and communications production for the second half of the year and its measures for enterprise consolidation. Efforts must be made to continuously correct the guiding ideology in managing enterprises, realistically shift the emphasis of economic work to improving economic benefits, do a good job in enterprise consolidation and solve all existing major problems. We must not retreat and return to the old track whenever we encounter problems. We must promote our strong points and avoid shortcomings and develop our province's superiority, learn Shanghai's work experience and carry out cooperative activities with fraternal provinces and municipalities on imparting and transferring the possession of technical skill and on carrying out technical training and improve our province's production and managerial levels.

QINGHAI CONFERENCE ON PARTY SPIRIT, WORK STYLE

SK140325 Xining Qinghai Provincial Service in Mandarin 1100 GMT 13 Aug 82

The conference used hosts of facts to prove that carrying out education on party spirit, party work style and party discipline among all party members and doing a good job in consolidating and establishing grassroots party organizations is very necessary. Most of our province's grassroots party organizations and party members are good or relatively good. However, we must note that some grassroots party organizations, even now, have failed to bring into play their role as the leadership core and fighting bastion. A large number of party members are weak in party spirit, unhealthy in work style and slack in discipline and have failed to bring into play the vanguard and exemplary role of Communist Party members. These problems have seriously undermined the party's prestige among the masses and weakened the party's combat strength.

The conference held that doing a good job in the three-points education and consolidating grassroots party organizations are absolutely coherent. We should never set them up in opposition to each other or set them apart. In carrying out education and consolidation work, we must attach prime importance to ideological education and consolidation and stress an improvement in educational work. In addition, we must carry out necessary consolidation of party organizations.

The conference pointed out: Consolidating grassroots party organizations is an important content and component of carrying out overall enterprise consolidation. During enterprise consolidation, we must integrate it with consolidation of grassroots party organizations.

The Government of the Republic of China makes further declarations as follows:

"The supply of adequate defensive weapons to the Republic of China is an established arms sales policy of the United States of America, formulated by and executed within the stipulations of the Taiwan Relations Act."

"Now the United States Government has mistaken the fallacious "peaceful intention" of the Chinese Communists as sincere and meaningful and consequently acceded to the latter's demand to put ceiling on both the quality and quantity of the arms to be sold to the Republic of China, it is in contravention of the letter and spirit of the Taiwan Relations Act, for which we must express our profound regret.

"The Chinese Communists would always justify the means they choose to employ in attaining their aims. The alternating employment of peace talk and military action is their traditional, inveterate trick. The Chinese Communists are exerting all efforts in waging an international united front campaign, with a view to further isolating the Republic of China. They are seeking all possible means to interrupt and discontinue U.S. arms sales to the Republic of China, trying to pave the way for their military invasion of this country.

"It is a serious mistake that the United States Government, failing to comprehend the real nature of the trick and fraud of the Chinese Communists, unwittingly issued the above-said document jointly with them.

"During the process of discussions on the so-called joint communique, the U.S. side has kept the Government of the Republic of China informed of its developments, and at the same time the Government of the Republic of China has presented to the United States its consistent position of firmly opposing the issuance of such a document.

"On July 14, 1982, the U.S. side, through appropriate channels, made the following points known to the Republic of China that the U.S. side:

1) Has not agreed to set a date for ending arms sales to the Republic of China.
2) Has not agreed to hold prior consultations with the Chinese Communists on arms sales to the Republic of China.
3) Will not play any mediation role between Taipei and Peiping.
4) Has not agreed to revise the Taiwan Relations Act.
5) Has not altered its position regarding sovereignty over Taiwan.
6) Will not exert pressure on the Republic of China to enter into negotiations with the Chinese Communists.

"We earnestly hope that the United States Government will not be deceived by but will see through the Chinese Communists' plot in attempting to annex our base of national recovery and to divide the free world. We also hope that the United States, upholding her founding spirit of freedom and justice, will fully and positively implement the Taiwan Relations Act to continue providing us with defensive arms so as to maintain the stability and prosperity of the Republic of China and to safeguard the peace and security of the Asian-Pacific region."

CHUNG YANG JIH PAO EXAMINES SHULTZ' CHINA POLICY

[Article by columnist Chen Yu-Ching: "The Return of 'Reagan's True Qualities' -- An Observation of Shultz' Prospective China Policy Measures"]

[Text] Most American conservatives and neoconservative radicals believe that U.S. diplomacy in the past 1 and 1/2 years has actually been Reagan's diplomacy without Reaganism. A week before Haig submitted his resignation, conservative columnist Will wrote an article entitled "Creeping Haigism," which said that Secretary of State Haig had seized every opportunity to dominate Reagan's diplomacy. He described Reagan as one of the U.S. presidents with the least influence on U.S. foreign policy and measures in modern times with the exception of Ford. He advocated stopping the spread of "Haigism" and having "Reagan's true qualities" returned. This is why the conservatives were delighted by Haig's dismissal from office. According to TIME magazine, however, (Loftun), chief editor of the CONSERVATIVE DIGEST. said that his delight lasted only 1 minute and 8 seconds. This is because Reagan named Shultz as Haig's successor as secretary of state 1 minute and 8 seconds after he announced Haig's resignation. Shultz is considered a middle-of-the-roader of the Republican Party who does not belong to the conservatives but has close relations with former Secretary of State Kissinger. Conservative radicals are deeply worried that this is a change not in essence but only in personnel and that Reagan's policy will hardly be carried out smoothly. This is actually an unnecessary worry. Although Shultz is generally considered to lack diplomatic experience and to have few definite opinions on foreign policy, he is a team player and definitely knows the proper limits of his powers and functions as secretary of state. Thus, he naturally will adopt the president's intentions as his own and cooperate and coordinate with other foreign policymakers in effectively carrying out President Reagan's foreign policy. Therefore, although not a conservative, Shultz, as the successor to Haig as secretary of state, will certainly bring an end to the days of "Haigism" and "the tripartite confrontation" (of the secretary of state, the secretary of defense and White House advisers). It can be assumed that the conservatives' recent slogan "Let Reagan Be Reagan" will gradually materialize in foreign policy, especially in U.S. policy toward China.

Shultz' Testimony Reflects a Good Attitude Toward China

At the confirmation hearings held by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, Shultz said that he had not yet discussed the Taiwan question with the president but had studied the latter's statements on this question. He advocated continuing arms sales to Taiwan according to its defense needs, including the sale of fighter planes. Hence, he would suggest that the president formally notify Congress of the decision to extend the production of F-5E fighters on Taiwan with U.S. cooperation. On the one hand, Shultz recognized the importance of U.S.-Chinese Communist relations and said that the development of bilateral relations should be encouraged; on the other hand, he maintained that the United States should faithfully fulfill its commitments to Taiwan as prescribed in the Taiwan Relations Act [TRA]. Therefore, Shultz' policy will be President Reagan's policy. In dealing with the China question, he said he would try to maintain a proper balance between both sides of the Taiwan Strait. However, he placed stress on the Middle East issue in his prepared policy statement, in which he made no mention of U.S. arms sales to Taiwan or any other questions concerning Taiwan. He made known his position on U.S. arms sales to Taiwan and the TRA while answering questions raised by conservative Senators Helms and Goldwater. It can be seen from this that Shultz did not have full understanding of the China question nor a definice stand on this matter at that time. In his testominy on 13 and 14 July, however, he repeatedly stressed that the president should dominate U.S. diplomacy and that his policy should be U.S. foreign policy. Therefore, his future China policy and measures will certainly be based on the president's intentions, and he will undoubtedly carry out Reagan's policy.

In answering qu stions from Senator Goldwater, Shultz also expressed his agreement with the senator's view that the Chinese Communists have no sovereignty or jurisdiction over Taiwan. Shultz also said that the so-called China question should be solved by the Chinese people themselves on both sides of the Taiwan Strait and that the United States only expects that it must be solved by peaceful means. This is the U.S. expectation as well as its commitment. For this reason the United States must sell arms to Taiwan in order to enable it to maintain its defense capabilities.

Haig Overstresses the Position of the Chinese Communists

Secretary of State Shultz' stand is actually a U.S. policy that has been in effect since President Carter normalized relations with the Chinese Communists. Haig's original attitude was also the same. It was alleged that Haig's proposal to sell arms to Peiping during his visit there in June 1981 was intended to shut the mouth of the Chinese Communists and make them tolerate U.S. weapons sales to Taiwan. A report by the New York TIMES on 30 January 1982 also stated that during his meeting with President Reagan last October, Huang Hua threatened that the Chinese Communists would have to downgrade diplomatic relations with the United States if it continued to supply weapons to Taiwan. The report stated that Haig immediately cut in and said with a pretty tough attitude: "We are also prepared to adopt such a measure." However, because of his excessive stress on the geographic position and strategic strength of the Chinese Communists and his overestimation of their weight on the international balance of power, Haig tried every means to submit to and appease the protests and demands of the Chinese Communists and thus formulated the strategic relations with the Chinese Communists and the unofficial linkage [the word "linkage" is printed in English in parentheses] with Taiwan. It is regrettable that President Reagan, who is accustomed to the "California lifestyle" of harmoniousness and amiableness, was easily persuaded by "political strategist" Haig to accept the so-called Haig "one-China" policy, as was reported by the New York TIMES, and therefore rejected the sale of advanced FX fighter aircraft. What followed was the announcement of the "three letters" submitting to the demands of the Chinese Communists, which created the mistaken U.S. policies and measures toward China of the past half year. These policies were totally and resolutely criticized and opposed by President Reagan during the election campaign, as was pointed out in a joint statement made by 26 conservative organizations. Can Shultz make changes in these matters and restore Reagan's true qualities? In a special commentary on 18 August, the New York TIMES said that Shultz came out for the post too late and probably will not be able, for the time being, to thoroughly change the diplomatic line so sedulously arranged by Haig.

However, if Shultz can resolutely abide by the United States' traditional stand on the Republic of China, he certainly will be able to control the complicated matters with a single method and all the difficult problems regarding the so-called China issue can be readily solved. The United States' traditional stand is to recognize that the Republic of China is a political entity as a practical matter and that the nature of its sovereignty does not change merely because of the change in its territory. Therefore, the first point in Secretary of State Dulles' statement on the policy of providing assistance in the defense of Kinmen and Matsu during the 1958 Kinmen-Matsu artillery duel was to stress that Kinmen, Matsu, Taiwan and Penghus had never been incorporated into Chinese Communist control. On the contrary, these islands have been under the jurisdiction of the Republic of China since the end of World War II. In other words, the Republic of China naturally has sovereignty over these islands, and the Chinese Communists have no right to interfere in the arrangements and measures made between the United States and the Republic of China on these islands. In the summer of 1962, when the Taiwan Strait crisis recurred as a result of the Chinese Communists' massing troops directly in front of the Taiwan Strait, President Kennedy issued a statement on 27 June, reaffirming the policy of Eisenhower and Dulles that the United States definitely would provide assistance to defend Kinmen and Matsu and would not change its traditional attitude toward the Republic of China.

The Chinese Communists Have No Right To Be Concerned With U.S. Measures

As a matter of fact, when fierce battles were going on during the 1958 Kinmen-Matsu artillery duel, British Foreign Secretary Lloyd even drafted a legal document claiming that Kinmen and Matsu belonged to the mainland. He sent it to the White House in an effort to dissuade the United States from providing assistance in defending Kinmen and Matsu. However, the Eisenhower administration was not moved but insisted that Kinmen and Matsu were territorial lands under the practical control of the Republic of China. The Chinese Communists' attack on Kinmen and Matsu was a prelude to their attempts to seize Taiwan and Penghus, which was certainly difficult for the United States to tolerate. Even President Nixon affirmed the long friendship between China and the United States, especially their relationship as allies during World War II, as was indicated in his "State of the World Message" issued after he opened the so-called bamboo curtain. He maintained that the development of relations between the United States and the Chinese Communists should not impair the interests of the Republic of China. Although President Carter helped bring about the "normalization" of relations between the United States and the Chinese Communists, he also earnestly expressed in his statement on the "establishment of diplomatic relations" the decision not to harm the well-being of the people in Taiwan. He did not hold talks on weapons sales to Taiwan. The fact that he signed this into law adequately showed that he, too, did not recognize any definite connections between the U.S. relationship with Taiwan and its relationship with the Chinese Communists.

Therefore, in the fall of 1981 when the Chinese Communists were strongly opposing U.S. weapon sales to Taiwan, he, as an honored guest of the Chinese Communists, openly declared on 27 August that the Chinese Communists had agreed to the continuation of supplying Taiwan with defensive weapons. However, since President Reagan took over the White House, the Chinese Communists, taking advantage of Reagan's fierce opposition to the Soviet Union and his stress on the importance of the Chinese Communists' position to deter the Soviet Union plus Secretary of State Haig's overestimation of the actual strategic power of the Chinese Communists, forced the United States to hold talks with them on weapons sales to Taiwan by offering the "reduction first, suspension later" principle. They went on to attack the TRA, claiming that its stipulation interfered with Chinese Communist internal affairs and demanding that it be revised or abrogated. They also repeatedly threatened that they would "downgrade diplomatic relations" if the Reagan administration obstinately refused to make a concession.

The Chinese Communists' insatiable blackmailing and threatening activities are old features and nothing surprising; however, it was rather strange that the United States was willing to allow their blackmailing and to hold talks with them, thus making a major mistake which was difficult to understand. On the one hand, President Reagan, after Haig's dismissal from office, returned for reconsideration a draft statement of agreement on the arms sales talks (which some news reports called Shanghai communique 11) that called for "progressively decreasing and eventually suspending arms sales to Taiwan." On the other hand, however, he also informed the Chinese Communists of his decision to extend the Sino-U.S. cooperative production of F-5E fighters, according to a New York TIMES report. This was obviously an unnecessary action which will inevitably be construed by the Chinese Communists as giving the U.S. the right to be concerned with policies and measures to ward China.

To Maintain the Balance of Power, It Is Necessary To Sell Precision Weapons

Therefore, if "Reagan's true qualities" are to be restored in future U.S. policies toward China, Secretary of State Shultz should strictly adhere to the United States' traditional stand on Kinmen, Matsu, Taiwan and Penghus and thoroughly reject the Chinese Communists' interference and concern. On the basis of the historical friendship and common interests between China and the United States, he should faithfully execute the TRA, maintain the balance of power in the Taiwan Strait and guarantee the security of northeast Asia and the western Pacific. The stability of the balance of power in the Taiwan Strait not only requires the United States to continue its policy of weapons sales to Taiwan but also requires it to enhance the quality of the weapons it sells.

At a Senate hearing in the spring of 1979, (Schneider), the last U.S. Taiwan defense commander, testified that as a result of the mainland's progress in military modernization, Taiwan was actually confronted with a serious military threat and that the danger would be intensified in 10 years. Therefore, he proposed that the United States supply the Republic of China with advanced precision weapons, such as F-16 fighter aircraft, RF-4E reconnaissance aircraft, advanced intermediate ground-to-ground and surface-to-air missiles, mobile radar stations and at least four submarines. By overcoming number with quality, the balance of power could then be maintained. The supply of such advanced weapons is a very urgent matter because the Chinese Communists will eventually use force to attack Taiwan and this attack will not wait until the Republic of China completes the renewal of its weapons and equipment and the development of new weapons. They will take some action in the next 3 to 5 years. This is also an important factor for Secretary of State Shultz to consider in determining the policies toward China.

The nature of U.S. policy toward China has changed over the past 18 months and, as a result, Reaganism is absent from U.S. measures on China. The crux of the matter is, of course, Haig's trickery as well as his manipulation by the bureaucratic structure of the State Department. However, this also had something to do with Congress' failure to supervise foreign policy and with the oversights of conservative groups in this connection. Not until 8 July did 28 U.S. conservative groups issue a joint statement denouncing the U.S. policy toward China for going off course. It they had made such a move when Haig visited Peiping in June 1981, when Haig was reportedly drafting a statement last November to appease the Chinese Communists or when Reagan disapproved the sale of FX fighters to Taiwan on 11 January 1981, they might have been able to stop the adverse current of appeasement and to retain "Reagan's true qualities" in the U.S. China policy.

The U.S. conservative forces once organized a general committee of 1 million persons which achieved remarkable results in opposing the Chinese Communist regime's bid to join the United Nations. If they now can set up a "comprehensive organization" like that to monitor the implementation of the TRA, arouse people's vigilance and prevent the pro-communist undercurrent, it will be instrumental in implementing the Reagan administration's China's policy. However, who is to blame for Congress' failure to supervise foreign policy and the slow reaction of the conservative groups? We should also make an honest self-examination in this regard.

BRIEFS

TITANIUM ALLOY -- The Republic of China has successfully developed a titanium alloy for use in the aviation industry. The alloy, which contains aluminum and vanadium beside titanium, is up to world standards with respect to strength and corrosion resistance. Plans are being made for industrial production of this alloy, and hopefully it will be put on the market in 2 years. [Taipei LIEN HO PAO in Chinese 18 Jul 82 p 1 OW]

NATURAL GAS DISCOVERY -- Taipei, 21 Jul (CNA) -- The state-run Chinese Petroleum Corp has announced the discovery of oil gas in its Chinshui oil fields in Miaoli, northwestern Taiwan. The company estimates the well will bring in a daily production of over 50,000 cubic meters of natural gas. Drilling rigs of the Chinshui R-79 well started to run in March of last year. Earlier this week oil men dug 5,290 meters below the surface and found rich gas deposits. Though gas testing on the well will not be completed until a week from now, Chinese petroleum officials are optimistic that the well is of great economic value with its estimated potential production of more than 50,000 cubic meters a day. If the officials are right, the Chinshui R-79 well will become the second largest gas well on the island, next only to the Chinshui R-38 which produces over 110,000 cubic meters daily. XIANG NAN LEADS FUJIAN'S ANTISMUGGLING FIGHT

[Text] On 7 March this year FUJIAN RIBAO issued under its masthead an editorial of less than 160 characters. This might be one of the shortest editorials in the history of the Chinese press. It could also find a place in the historical material of the press circles. The author of this editorial was Xiang Nan, first secretary of the Fujian CPC. This is not an ordinary article, but the declaration of an attack against economic crime and of the struggle to combat corrosion. The text of the editorial was as follows:

Why Is It That We Fail To Handle Some Cases for a Long Time?

Today, this paper has made public another two important cases. It is a fine thing that these criminals have been exposed and dealt with. There are some problems which the masses are quite aware of and the cadres have talked a lot about. The nature of these problems is quite obvious, but for what reasons have we failed to handle these problems, and failed to handle them for a long period?

The first is one's self being tainted. The second is the trouble caused by factionalism.

The third is being weak and incompetent. Are there any more? Perhaps there are some more, but these three are the main reasons.

Why can't you handle the problems in your unit? Why don't you think over which of the reasons is the cause? This editorial sharply pointed out the crux of this matter. As the commander in chief of the whole province, Xiang Nan has great determination and dares to charge forward. In fact, another editorial entitled "Use the Party's Style of Work To Lead the People's Style published on 14 January in FUJIAN RIBAO was also personally written by Xiang Nan.

As is known to all, Fujian is the coastal front of China. Fujian is also the frontier in the struggle to attack crime in the economic field. According to the figures of the departments concerned, in the year 1981 there were 30,000 cases of smuggling and speculating in the whole province. Among them, there were 253 cases each involving over 10,000 yuan. There were 150 ships involved in smuggling goods. Roughly estimated, the goods smuggled were valued at 200 million yuan. The smuggled goods which were confiscated amounted to 36.77 million yuan. The confiscation rate was only 18 percent.

Why is it that the smuggling, trafficking and speculating activites are so rampant in Fujian? A year ago, when Xiang Nan had just arrived in Fujian, he did not have any idea about this problem. Now he has the right to speak, because he has grasped the first hand information and anlyzed some typical cases. At the enlarged party committee meeting of the provincial organs held on 5 February, Xiang Nan loudly appealed: "All the cadres of the provincial organs should set an example for the whole province in vigorously attacking smuggling, corruption and bribery!" He said: "Without collusion from the top and bottom and inside and outside, it would be impossible for them to engage in smuggling and speculating."

This is how things are. The following is a case personally handled by Xiang Nan. During mid-December 1979 the Qingyang industrial and commercial unit of the Jinjiang County industrial and commercial department confiscated a large quantity of electronic calculators, watches, gold, silver and foreign currency smuggled by Cai Sue. This Cai Sue was infinitely resourceful, and actually, these confiscated smuggled goods were returned to Cai untouched. It turned out that Shi Yuanmu, section chief of the personnel section of the industrial and commercial department of Jinjiang County, was often one of Cai's guests. They had colluded with each other for a long time.

It was with this backer that CAI's illegal activities became daily more rampant. Once CAI had some inferior cloth to sell and the purchaser would not accept it, so Shi tried to use his power to threaten the purchaser: "If you won't accept it, you are not going to get a pass for any other materials." This forced the purchaser to submit to humiliation and accept the inferior cloth. On another occasion, Shi sold a number of CAI's smuggled watches to a unit in Hangzhou at a high price under the pretense of "sale of confiscated watches" and offered certificates in the name of the industrial and commerical department of Jinjiang County requesting "the checkpoints throughout the journey to allow them to pass." Shi also made use of departmental chops he kept to forge false certificates and documents to give the green light to CAI's smuggling, and therefore to profit from it.

As a matter of fact, Shi Yuanmu's activity of acting as a smuggling agency was exposed 1 year ago. But some leaders of the Jinjiang County financial office and CPC committee felt there was "insufficient evidence and data" and this caused the case to be suspended. Recently, because the Discipline Inspection Commission of the CPC and Xiang Nan directly and personally took up the matter and examined materials, this case is now being seriously handled.

"When those above behave unworthily, those below will do the same." Xiang Nan strictly behaves himself in every way. Whenever they have to set off for the countryside, he will ask the secretary to advise the accompanying personnel to take food coupons and also request the grassroots cadres not to make any special arrangements.

There is a short story that is widely known: In August last year, in accordance with the suggestions of the leaders of the provincial CPC, the multiple food products factory of Cutian started production of Yin-er tea. In October, when a cadre of the FUJIAN YOUTH periodical came to Cutian to get some information on the production of Yin-er tea, the factory took out three samples boxes of Yin-er tea and sent one box as a gift to FUJIAN YOUTH and asked the cadre to convey the other two boxes to Xiang Nan. When the cadres returned to Fuzhou, he handed the two boxes of Yin-er tea and the report on the production of Yin-er tea to Xiang Nan's secretary. A few days later, Xiang Nan's secretary came to the cadre and told him that Xiang Nan had read the report and had given instructions to return the two sample boxes of Yin-er tea to the factory. This cadre was deeply moved. He immediately posted back to the factory the two boxes of Yin-er tea together with an amount of money equivalent to the retail price of the box of tea he received for FUJIAN YOUTH. This story deeply moved and educated the cadres, and they all praised Xiang Nan's fine style of taking the lead personally.

HONG KONG STANDARD ON HONG KONG'S FUTURE

[Article by Terry Cheng]

[Text] Chinese officials will not join the local administration, when Beijing regains Hong Kong's sovereignty in order to keep the intervention to the minimum, according to the latest issue of WIDE ANGLE magazine, published today.

The pro-Beijing monthly in an article, which give most details so far of China's latest plans for Hong Kong's fate, says the future authorities will tolerate existing opposition publications and dissidents, provided that they do not break the law.

The administration, which is to be headed by a local Chinese, may even "suppress" riots initiated by local groups claiming they are responding to calls from Beijing.

The article, which quotes highly-placed Chinese sources in Beijing and here, is believed to have been written by the magazine's publisher, who is a veteran leftwing figure.

The article says the Chinese sources spoke from "a personal point of view", but with a definite mood.

The existing officials below the governor will be allowed to stay and the welfare system will be maintained. But the article hints that some of the officials may be employed only as advisers.

Freedom of entry and exist will be guaranteed, the article continues, and people from places like South Korea and Taiwan will be able to come and leave as in the past. But Chinese from the mainland will still be restricted from entering Hong Kong.

The WIDE ANGLE article also reports on China's plan for Hong Kong's new chief administrator, status, and economic and legal systems. The report coincides with the STANDARD's earlier reports on the plan. Hong Kong will fly the Chinese flag instead of the British one, but its future chief will be a Chinese elected locally. The article, however, says his election may have to be confirmed by Beijing. It is not necessary for him to be an advocate of socialism, the article quotes the Chinese sources as saying. "He is qualified if he agrees to the principle that China regains Hong Kong's sovereignty, and has the necessary prestige and capability.

"China needs a (Singaporean prime minister) Lee Kuan Yew-type person in Hong Kong."

The article goes on to say Hong Kong's status as a free trade port and international financial centre will be maintained.

And Hong Kong will be allowed to keep its power to enter into separate economic agreements with other countries, such as the multi-fibre arrangement. The territory's economic system and life-style will be kept intact, the article says.

It continues that the Hong Kong dollar will maintain its international standing. "The Hong Kong and Shanghai Bank and Chartered Bank can continue to issue, the currency, but probably without the queen's head on it."

According to the article, the Chinese sources say the majority of the Hong Kong laws will be retained, and will only require minor revisions.

Hong Kong can set up its own supreme court of appeal, without taking cases to London or Beijing, the sources add. External Affairs including defence, however, will be handled by the central government, the article says. But its says China will not station People's Liberation Army units or naval vessels here. Internal Affairs, like security, will be handled by the local administration.

The article says China will adopt the approach of "operating two different systems within a country" as a solution for Hong Kong's future.

It does not say what will be the future mode of Hong Kong's administration. The STANDARD's own sources said earlier that Hong Kong would be made into a "special administrative region" as proposed in the draft constitution.

The article also does not specify when China intends to regain Hong Kong's sovereignty. According to the July 1 edition of PAI SHING fortnightly magazine, Deng Xiaoping told a group of prominent leftwing figures that China would reclaim sovereignty around 1997.

The WIDE ANGLE article reports that the discussion of the plan is not now restricted to the "top-leveled" people.

HSIN WAN PAO URGES JAPAN TO REVIEW ITS HISTORY

HK170235 Hong Kong HSIN WAN PAO in Chinese 16 Aug 82 p 1

["New Talk" column: "Japan Must Make up for Its Missed History Lesson"]

[Text] Yesterday Japanese Prime Minister Zenko Suzuki led some members of his Cabinet to attend a gathering held in Budokan in Tokyo to "mourn for those killed in the war and pray for peace." After that, they visited the Yasukuni shrine, where Zenko Suzuki wrote down the title of "prime minister" when he signed the visitor's guestbook.

In previous years, two Japanese prime ministers have also visited the Yasukuni shrine, but they were personal visits. Zenko Suzuki also paid a personal visit there last year. However, according to the Japanese Jiji press, the addition of the title above his signature confuses the nature of the visit and indicates a tendency to consider it as the beginning of "official visits."

Suzuki said to reporters yesterday: "We mourn for the spirits in heaven of those killed in the war because we want of avoid catastrophic wars and pray for eternal peace."

The memorial tablets of the militarists are kept in the Yasukuni shrine. These war criminals have massacred the Asian people and are owed bloody debts. If there really is a heaven and hell, the spirits of these devils who have killed would never be admitted to heaven and would be kept in the deepest part of hell and would never be redeemed. Suzuki's visit to the Yasukuni shrine as prime minister not only confuses the nature of the visit but also confuses right and wrong.

There were Japanese people killed in the war who deserved to be mourned. The broad masses of Japanese people suffered during the war of aggression and a large number of Japanese youths were sent to the battlefields by the Japanese militarists. In addition, many of the officials and soldiers of the Japanese army died. While mourning for these people, it is necessary to remember and learn from the bitter lesson of foreign aggression. It is necessary to forbid the revival of militarism.

However, it cannot be denied that among those Japanese victims there were a small number militarist elements who had to be held responsible for their crimes during the war; and that those among them who were condemned to death and executed as war criminals by the international court were in fact guilty of crimes for which even death could not atone. What else did the Japanese officials mean by giving a memorial service to these war criminals if they were not trying to call back the spirit of militarism?

At yesterday's memorial service, Zenko Suzuki said in his memorial speech, "during those fierce battles, our 3 million-odd compatriots prayed at every moment for the peace and prosperity of the motherland, thought about the destiny of their relatives, and died in battlefields, on their posts or in the war disasters, or died abroad after the war. Whenever thinking of them, we are always overwhelmed with grievances." Zenko Suzuki just threw everything together and did not discriminate between militarist elements and those victims who had been driven to play the roles of cannon fodder. Then, who was he actually aiming at with his "grievances?" Can he ever lay blame on the Asian people who defeated the Japanese aggressors?

In the last 30-odd years, Japan has always ambiguously called "15 August" the "war termination memorial day" and has refused to acknowledge that this day marks the crushing defeat of the aggressors and their unconditional surrender. And now, it even goes so far as to tamper with history and beautify its aggressive acts. Premier Zenko Suzuki's presence at yesterday's memorial service has done nothing to clear up the historical facts.

It seems that Japan needs to make up missed history lessons and sum up experience for its defeat in the past militarist aggressive war. Among those who must be included to make up the missed lessons are the officials and the heads of the Japanese Government.

SFRY, BANGLADESH OFFICIALS STRESS NONALIGNED ROLE

[Text] Dacca, August 16 (XINHUA) -- Bangladesh President Ahsanuddin Chowdhury today expressed his country's conviction that the spirit of the Non-Aligned Movement would be rekindled in the forthcoming non-aligned summit. He made the remarks here at a banquet he hosted in honour of the visiting Yugoslav Government delegation led by Radovan Vlajkovic, member of the Presidency of the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. The Bangladesh president hoped that efforts would be pooled by all concerned to achieve the common goals of the movement. He condemned Israel for its flagrant injustice and naked aggression against the Palestinians and demanded the unconditional withdrawal of Israeli forces from all occupied territories including Lebanon and the restoration of the inalienable national rights of the Palestinians to establish a state. He also condemned the continued perpetration of injustice in Namibia and Tanzania by racists. In his speech, Radovan Vlajkovic expressed his hope that the forthcoming 7th non-aligned summit should be convened successfully. The Non-Aligned Movement, he said, has strengthened and become an influential force and an irreplaceable factor in the solution of all major world problems. He strongly condemned the Israeli aggression against the Palestinian and Lebanese peoples and the arms race by superpowers. Referring to the Afghan and Kampuchean issues, he said that there would be no resolution of the problems of Afghanistan and Cambodia unless foreign troops were withdrawn.

HU QIAOMU FETES SCHOLARS AT LINGUISTICS MEETING

[Text] Beijing, August 17 (XINHUA) -- Hu Qiaomu, president of the Chinese Academy of Social Sciences, gave a reception for foreign scholars participating in the 15th International conference on Sino-Tibetan languages and linguistics here this evening. He said: "Research on Sino-Tibetan languages is of great significance to Chinese linguists because they are languages of our nation and our brotherly nationalities. It is our unshakeable duty to study the history and present conditions of these languages." He said the conference has provided both Chinese and foreign scholars an opportunity to exchange ideas and views.

"It will exert an active and beneficial influence on China's research of Sino-Tibetan languages and promote international cultural interflow," he said.

Present on the occasion were Zhang Wensong, vice-minister of education; Zhang Youyu and Huan Xiang, vice-presidents of the Chinese Academy of Social Sciences; and Zhang Longxiang, president of Beijing University.

REAGAN APPEALS FOR TAX INCREASE SUPPORT

OW171938 Beijing XINHUA in English 1848 GMT 17 Aug 82

[Text] Washington, August 16 (XINHUA) -- President Ronald Reagan today appealed to the Americans to back his 98.3 billion dollar tax increase bill over the next three years.

In a nation-wide televised speech tonight, Reagan said the bill may be politically unpopular but it is fair, because it can help reduce the interest rate, recover economy and create more jobs.

The tax increase bill, which encountered opposition from many congressmen, Republican conservatives in particular, was approved by the Senate and House conferees yesterday after a ten-day heated debate.

The bill is scheduled for votings separately in the Senate and the House later this week and then it will come into effect after the President gives the final approval.

The bill, proposed by the Reagan administration, was designed to reduce huge budget deficits. If it is passed, the deficit is expected to be 115 billion dollars according to the administration, and 150 billion dollars according to the Congressional Budget Office.

In addition to increased taxes for smokers, airline travelers, corporations and families with big medical expenses, and a fight against tax evasion, the bill will reduce spending by 15.2 billion dollars in social welfare over the next three years.

[Words indistinct] taken to be the corner-stone of Reagan's conservative economic policy. He propelled himself into office on the fuel of his anti-tax rhetoric. A little more than one year after he took office, however, he is being forced by the economic recession and huge budget deficits to call for the largest peacetime tax increase.

Reagan's proposal is strongly opposed by some conservative Republican congressmen and his supply-side economists. They accuse the President of deserting his own economic principles and insist that tax increases cannot stimulate the economy but will harm the position of his Republican Party in the November congressional elections.

In the past ten days, Reagan met with more than 200 Republican congressmen in lobbying sessions to seek votes for the bill besides making speeches to enlist public support.

However, the press and business circles are still skeptical about the efficiency of the new bill and the possibility of its passage through the Congress. As White House Chief of Staff James Baker put it yesterday, "this is going to be a very, very difficult battle, it's very much uphill."

PRIME MINISTER SUZUKI'S VISIT TO YASUKUNI SHRINE

Attends Memorial Service

[Text] Tokyo, 15 Aug (XINHUA) -- The Japanese Government held a memorial rite here today for those who fell in the Japanese war of aggression in China and the Pacific region. This is the first service to be held since the Japanese Cabinet decided on 13 April this year to officially designate "15 August" as the annual anniversary for "mourning [zhui dao 6620 1902] the war dead and praying for peace."

The service was attended by 1,000 government officials and representatives of political parties and social rganizations. They included Prime Minister Zenko Suzuki, Speaker of the House of Representatives Hajime Fukuda, President of the House of Councillors Masatoshi Tokunaga, Chief of the Supreme Court Takaaki Hattori, Cabinet ministers, Dietmen, governors of prefectures and presidents of prefectural assemblies. About 6,500 representatives of bereaved families were also present. Crown Prince Akiwito and his wife attended the service on behalf of Emperor Hirohito and Empress Nagako. In his memorial speech Suzuki said: "In the raging battles, more than 3 million of our compatriots fell on the battlefields. At their work posts or in the flames of war, hoping for the country's peace and prosperity [an tai 1344 3141] and thinking of their dear ones' future [wei lai 2607 0171]: Still others died in foreign lands after the war. Whenever recalling them to mind, I cannot help being filled with bitter hatred [tong hen zhi qing bu jin man xiong huai 4027 1868 0037 1906 0008 4391 3341 5172 2037]."

Memorial activities of different forms were held in various other places in Japan today, the Ministry of Health and Social Affairs said.

After the memorial service, Suzuki went to the Yasukuni Shrine to pay his homage to the war dead. Cabinet ministers, except those not in Tokyo, also went to the shrine. Suzuki signed the visitors book with the title of "prime minister of the Cabinet." When Japanese reporters asked whether he came in his official capacity or just personally, Suzuki replied: "I come to mourn the souls of the war dead in heaven and pray for lasting peace to avert a catastrophic war."

According to Japanese press reports, two Japanese prime ministers had previously visited the Yasukuni Shrine to pay their personal homage, and Zenko Suzuki also visited the shrine in his own name last year. In the past 2 days, a number of organizations and members of opposition parties in Japan held meetings or made statements opposing Cabinet members' paying visits to the Yasukuni Shrine or taking other moves to embellish the aggressive war.

ASAHI SHIMBUN 16 Aug Article

[Text] Tokyo, August 16 (XINHUA) -- ASAHI SHIMBUN pointed out in an article today that the presence of Zenko Suzuki at the Yasukuni Shrine in his capacity as the Japanese prime minister "played down the political responsibility for the past war and the self-reproaching mentality and did personal service to the daily mounting right deviation."

Suzuki went to the Yasukuni Shrine to pay homage to the fallen in the Japanese war of aggression in China and the Pacific region on the occasion of the 37th anniversary of Japan's surrender at the end of the Second World War. Suzuki signed the visitors book in the capacity of "the prime minister of the Cabinet."

The article said that within the ruling Liberal Democratic Party, the number of those who advocate amendment to the war-abandoning Ninth Article of the Constitution is increasing. "An uneasiness over the current against history is spreading among the people," it added.

[Article by Wei Zhenzhong [5898 2182 0022]: "An Observer's Notes on the Yasukuni Shrine in Tokyo"]

[Text] The distortion of history by the Japanese Ministry of Education when revising textbooks on the Japanese aggression against China and other Asian countries reminds me of the spring sacrifice in the Yasukuni Shrine I witnessed in Japan. The agitation to worship Yasukuni Shrine and the revision of textbooks are activities of some people in Japan who have ulterior motives to whip up opinions for the revival of militarism.

The Yasukuni Shrine was established in the second year of Meiji [1869], with "Tokyo Conjuration Society" as its original name. In the 12th year of Meiji, it was changed to Yasukuni Shrine. Enshrined here are 2.4 million people who "took part in the events of battles from 1853 -- the end of the Tokugawa Shogunate period -- to the recent great east Asian war period."

At about 10 o'clock on a fine Sunday morning last April, in front of the gate of the Yasukuni Shrine in a district of Tokyo, there was already a bustling scene, with crowds of people, a sea of flags and unceasing propaganda over the loudspeaker. People came in groups or individually to worship at the shrine. Some of them even took their children with them. But most of them were between the ages of 50 and 60.

A large number of worshipers signed their names in protest at the gate of the shrine in order to answer the call of the petition movement waged by a "society for requiting the spirits of martyrs," which required the "national protection and support" of the Yasukuni Shrine and required that state representatives and official guests from other countries pay "formal worship" to this shrine.

The collective worship activities were organized chiefly by the old armymen organizations. The number of old armymen's organizations was surprisingly great. In a small courtyard there were more than 20 flags for armymen organizations of this kind such as the "Eerduosi [6759 1422 1122 2448] Society of the 71st Wing of the North Branch Task Forces." The "Third Squadron of the Third Group of the Pan Long [5847 7893] Society Ground Forces of the Manchuria Independent Rear Guards," the "Hua Lin [2901 2651] Society of the Manchuria 453-4 Army Units," the "Third Group of the Third Wing of the Body Guards Ground Forces," and so on and so forth.

In front of the Yasukuni Shrine there are two symmetrical octagon-shaped Japanese water towers. They are monuments built in 1935 to eulogize the militarist aggressive wars. The inscriptions on the towers say that the building of these "lamps" was aimed at "commemorating, with respect and admiration, the martyrs who have loyally devoted themselves to the imperial fortunes." On these eight-sided monuments, there are relief sculptures of scenes from all previous aggressive wars, with written captions encouraging militarism and aggression.

In the courtyard of the Tokugawa Shrine, the exhibits, which give off the scent of militarism, are easily seen everywhere. There are Kelubo [0344 5712 0130] cannons which the Japanese army used in the wars with China and Russia, and the "No 5631 Railway Engine" it used on the Southeastern Asian battlefields, as well as Howitzers, antiaircraft guns and the Huitian-type [0932 1131] torpedoes the aggressive army used in wartime.

Most of the exhibits in the Yasukuni Shrine were painstakingly collected after World War II, especially in the past 10 years and more after 1965, when the Japanese economy swiftly developed.

Near midday, when hearing the bugle calls, some old armymen soon gathered and stood in lines at the gate of the Yasukuni Shrine, listening attentively to the speeches broadcast over the loudspeakers. These old armymen, though gray-haired or bald due to their old age, and dressed in peacetime Western coats, were still full of the "bushido" spirit which they had acquired during their service in the "Imperial Army".

Every year, two "memorial ceremonies" are held, one in spring and the other in autumn: 21-23 April and 17-19 October. As a matter of fact, ordinary ceremonies (such as the "consoling-spirit ceremonies" under various pretexts) are often held throughout the year.

According to reports by some Japanese papers, in 1968 the memorial tablets of 14 war criminals headed by Tojo were also placed in the Yasukuni Shrine to be worshiped together with other "martyrs who died after 1926". (By the way, please note that the Ikebukuro-Ku government in Tokyo has already built a monument to Tojo and other war criminals at the place where they were hanged.)

Over the past few years, the question of the Yasukuni Shrine has become an important question in the internal political struggle in Japan. A force in society is now exerting pressure on the government, demanding to change the Yasukuni Shrine from civil management into one under state management, that is, into a state setup. Since 1969 the Japanese Liberal-Democratic Party [LDP] has presented five bills to the Diet on the Yasukuni Shrine, but has not succeeded in passing any due to the strong collective opposition of the parties not in power. However, it has not resigned itself to defeat. On 15 August last year, and on the eve of this day, some chief officials of the Japanese Government successively went to worship at this shrine.

The Japanese Socialist Party (JSP), the Clean Government Party (Komeito), the Communist Party (JCP) and the Sohyo. as well as democratic forces of various social strata, are all in opposition to the nationalization of the Yasukuni Shrine. They deem it a violation of the Constitution, especially of the provisions in the Constitution concerning the separation of church and state. They point out that the activities of the LDP on the question of the Yasukuni Shrine are expressions of the right turn of Japanese internal politics. Buddhist organizations and Christian associations also oppose "state management" of the Yasukuni shrine. It seems that the struggles between various domestic forces in Japan over the question of the Yasukuni Shrine will be continued and will become more acute in the future.

Seeing various scenes and activities in the Yasukuni Shrine, one cannot very well avoid asking the following question: Have some people in the Japanese ruling class really learned a lesson from World War II? If they say they have also drawn a lesson by themselves, then what on earth is this lesson?

KYODO: WAN LI SAYS SUZUKI VISIT STILL WELCOME

OW180919 Tokyo KYODO in English 0917 GMT 18 Aug 82

[Text] Beijing, Aug 18, KYODO -- Chinese Vice Premier Wan Li said Wednesday Japanese Prime Minister Zenko Suzuki is welcome to Beijing despite the current dispute over Japan's school textbooks. Suzuki is scheduled to visit China late next month to mark the 10th anniversary of the establishment of diplomatic relations between Japan and the People's Republic of China.

Observers in Tokyo have said Suzuki may have to cancel his trip because of the diplomatic row over the textbooks which, China and South Korea claim, toned down Japanese wartime military conduct in the two countries. The Beijing government withdrew its invitation to Japanese Education Minister Heiji Ogawa, who planned to visit China early next month.

"The education minister is unfriendly," Wan said when he met members of a visiting Japanese Bunraku puppet troupe. But he added: "We are sure Prime Minister Suzuki will be welcome." "The textbook dispute, no doubt, can be settled," Wan was quoted as saying.

The troupe members later met reporters here.

The controversy stemmed from a recent revision of Japanese history textbooks which, after editorial screening by the Education Ministry, switched the wording Japanese "invasion" of China to "advance" into the country. China has officially asked Japan to correct the "distortion" but the education minister has rejected the request.

Wan, a freedom fighter against Japan before and during World War II, said the dispute will be settled if Japan is prepared to "write correctly" in the textbooks. "Distorting historical facts cannot be permitted. Historical facts reject sentimentalism," he was quoted as telling the members.

HONGQI Article Cited

HK150804 Beijing ZHONGGUO XINWEN SHE in Chinese 0730 GMT 15 Aug 82

[Text] Beijing, 15 Aug (ZHONGGUO XINWEN SHE) — A commentator's article in the latest issue of HONGQI magazine points out that the move of the Japanese Education Ministry in publicly distorting the history of Japanese external aggression in the course of screening school textbooks absolves the Japanese militarists from their war crimes and is a grave sign that there is the danger of a revival of militarism in Japan.

The article says the Japanese militarist forces suffered a crushing defeat in World War II. Since the war, their remnants have always been thinking of staging a comeback, but they have never been able to succeed because of the resolute resistance of the Japanese people and the strong opposition of the peoples of Asia. What should be noticed is that militarist elements have by no means vanished in Japan; there are many of them in the numerous extreme rightwing groups in the country today. These people are carrying out all kinds of activities in a bid to revive militarism, and are vainly thinking of turning Japan from an economic into a military great power and reliving the old dream of the "Greater East Asia Coprosperity Sphere."

The article points out that Japan, which has practiced external aggression in its history, owes a debt to the victims of its aggression. As far as China is concerned, over 10 million people were killed by Japan's war of aggression in the 1930's and 1940's, while property damage exceeded $50 billion. Was not a considerable part of the capital and wealth of Japan -- which has now become an "economic big power" -- in fact plundered from other countries by aggressive war and colonial rule?

The article says the Chinese people do not demand that the present Japanese Government assume responsibility for the war; and, for the sake of friendship between China and Japan, they have also dropped their demand for reparations.

However, the Chinese people and all Asian people who suffered Japanese aggression have the right to demand that the present Japanese Government assume a political and moral responsibility to curb the attempts of extreme rightwing forces in Japan to revive militarism; to tell the Japanese people, and particularly the younger generation, the historical truth; and to teach them never again to allow Japan to become a militarist state launching external wars of aggression. At present, far from being willing to do this, certain people in the present Japanese Government actually want to distort history and prettify militarism. This is a dereliction of duty.

The article says, the Japanese Government's attitude of self-reproach for the wars Japan launched against China was written as a major principle into the Sino-Japanese joint statement on the establishment of diplomatic relations and was also affirmed by the treaty of peace and friendship. It is a prerequisite for the development of peaceful and friendly relations between China and Japan. This prerequisite cannot be overthrown. To do so means to wreck the basis for the establishment and development of peaceful and friendly relations between the two countries. The article says, the Japanese Government should squarely face the Education Ministry's distortion of the history of Japanese aggression against China while screening school textbooks -- an affair that harms relations between the two countries -- and take practical action to preserve the basis for friendly relations between China and Japan by correcting this error.

Japanese Teachers Rap Changes

HK160944 Wuhan Hubei Provincial Service in Mandarin 1100 GMT 15 Aug 82

[Text] The delegation of the Education and Welfare Association of Aomori Prefecture in Japan, which has recently and resolutely visited Yichang, opposes the clumsy trick of the Japanese Ministry of Education, which tampered with the history of Japanese aggression against China in examining and revising history textbooks. The members of the delegation said all of us are teachers in primary and secondary schools; we have the responsibility to tell our students about the historical fact that the Japanese militarists aggressed China.

In late 1938 the Japanese militarists inflicted three large-scale bombardments on Yichang Municipality, and killed nearly 10,000 people. On the third day of the first lunar month of 1939, when the people in Yichang were clebrating the spring festival, the Japanese troops dispatched a vast number of airplanes to bombard the residential districts around the Great East Gate. More than 5,000 innocent residents were injured or killed. On 12 June 1940, while occupying Yichang, the Japanse troops carried out the savage scorched-earth policy, and nearly destroyed Yichang City by fire over 5 successive days. After the fire, there were only three houses left and a beautiful city had almost completely vanished. During the 5 years and 5 months when the Japanese troops occupied Yichang, the population of the municipality was reduced from more than 40,000 perople to about 8,000 people.

In recalling the criminal and savage acts the Japanese militarists committed in aggressing against China, the 17 teachers, who are teaching in senior and junior secondary schools and primary schools in Aomori Prefecture, strongly denounced the Japanese Ministry of Education for tampering with the history of the aggression against China and trying vainly to revive Japanese militarism. They said, only by letting our students know about the history of the Japanese militarists' aggression against China can we urge them in a better way to make more contributions to Sino-Japanese friendship. We must carry out resolute struggle against those in the Ministry of Education who tried to tamper with history. As teachers, we can never tell lies to our children against our conscience.

DPRK PAPER CRITICIZES JAPANESE WAR FILM

[Text] Pyongyang, August 16 (XINHUA) -- NODONG SINMUN in an article today accused the Japanese authorities of showing the film "Dai Nippon Teikoku" (The Imperial Japanese Empire), which prettifies Japanese war criminal Hideki Tojo. The article pointed out that through "The Imperial Japanese Empire", the Japanese authorities want to inculcate national chauvinism and the idea of militarist aggression in the minds of the Japanese people in an attempt to lead them, the younger generation in particular, again on to the road of war of aggression.

The article also revealed that a Japanese film whitewashing Hirobumi Ito, war criminal of the Japanese aggression against Korea, had been produced. It is worth noting that the production of films which embellish Japanese militarism has coincided with the screening of the revised history textbooks, the article added. It stressed that it is intolerable to the Asian people that the Japanese films should describe war criminals Hideki Tojo and Hirobumi Ito as "patriots".

RENMIN RIBAO: BURMA USES FOREIGN AID TO DEVELOP

HK130809 Beijing RENMIN RIBAO in Chinese 12 Aug 82

[Article by Zhang Yunfei [1728 7189 7378]: "Burma Uses Foreign Aid To Develop Its Economy"]

[Text] From 1978 to 1981, the Burmese GNP grew realtively fast, with an average annual growth rate of 6.6 percent. One of the reasons for this speedy development is that it has used foreign aid to promote industrial and agricultural production.

According to statistics: Since 1976, Burma has accepted foreign aid totaling $2.053 billion, an average $410 million a year. A small portion has been through donations, while the remainder is in the form of long-term interest-free or low-interest loans.

The foreign aid has been used mainly on key departments that play an important role in the national economic development. A considerable amount of the foreign aid has been used to speed up agricultural development, to construct water conservation projects and to supply chemical fertilizer, agricultural chemicals, agricultural tools and machines to the peasants. As a result, they have reaped bumper harvests for many years. From 1978-81, the average annual growth rate of the Burmese GNP was 8.6 percent. The Forestry Department also has made use of foreign aid to import advanced technology and equipment. Therefore, forestry production has gradually surpassed the prewar level and the volume of timber export has increased to more than $100 million.

Burma also has made use of foreign aid to develop oil, mining and power industries. The oil industry has developed relatively quickly. In 1975, Burma stopped importing oil. Today, it is able to export some oil every year. Apart from this, Burma also has used foreign aid to build a number of plants to manufacture light and textile industrial goods and food, in order to solve the immediate needs of the people and to ease the situation of short supply in the market.

Burma has always adopted a cautious attitude toward accepting foreign aid and using foreign capital. It has gradually formulated its own methods. First of all, Burma adheres to the policy of not allowing infringement upon the sovereignty of the country and will only accept foreign aid with no political conditions attached. Second, it asks for interest-free or low-interest long-term loans, while accepting donations. Third, the amount of the loans is controlled within the limit of its ability to repay.

Not long ago, President U San Yu stressed in his speech at a meeting that Burma must use its own capital to expand investment in enterprises. If the financial resources are insufficient, it should absorb some foreign capital. Borrowed capital must be invested in projects that can best bring economic returns into full play, make the biggest profit and are most worthwhile.

[Text] Moscow, August 16 (XINHUA) -- Wojciech Jaruzelski, first secretary of the Central Committee of the Polish United Workers Party and prime minister, met Soviet leader Leonid Brezhnev in the Crimea today and informed each other of the main thrust of the policy of the two states, according to a TASS report. On the developments in Poland, Jaruzelski said that "positive changes are gradually taking place in the country." He said "the movement for national rebirth, called upon to rally all Polish patriots who cherish the historical and socialist values of Poland, is developing. At the same time the hard consequences of the political and economic crisis still make themselves felt. The process of the country's emergence from the crisis is being held back by the existence of a counter-revolutionary underground whose activities are inspired and supported from the outside, from the United States, in the first place."

Brezhnev and Jaruzelski stated with satisfaction that Soviet-Polish ties are being further strengthened. Brezhnev said that the Soviet Union will continue to give "whatever assistance it can" to Poland in the solution of economic problems confronting it. Josef Czyrek, secretary of the Central Committee of the Polish United Workers Party, Soviet Foreign Minister Andrei Gromyko and Konstantin Chernenko, secretary of the Central Committee of the Soviet Communist Party, were present on the occasion.

[Text] Beirut, August 16 (XINHUA) -- Lebanese Prime Minister Shafiq al-Wazzan said today Palestinian fighters would start the evacuation of the besieged west Beirut at the end of this week at the latest. Al-Wazzan made the statement after talks with U.S. presidential envoy Philip Habib on the time of the arrival of the multinational peace-keeping force and ways of its deployment in Beirut.

Al-Wazzan said the answer brought by Habib from Israel today is that differences have been narrowed to the point of "nearing disappearance." We have actually come close to implementation of the agreement," he said. He expected preparations for withdrawal will be totally completed within the next two days and an official agreement will be announced on August 18 when the Lebanese Cabinet convenes its session. Al-Wazzan said the multinational peace-keeping force will arrive "at a suitable time" under the agreement.

Al-Wazzan today met Hani Hassan, political adviser to leader of the Palestine Liberation Organization Yasir 'Arafat, informing him of the progress of the talks.

According to radio Israel, Habib will return to Washington within one day or so to accept his "new duty" for seeking a "comprehensive solution to the Lebanese crisis."

The ceasefire between Israel and PLO entering the fourth day today and the optimism resulting from the political talks have brought west Beirut some vitality. The number of cars from the east to the west has apparently increased and some shops have opened. Meanwhile, preparations for a presidential election on Thursday are under way.

2,000 Lebanese regular army and security men have been ordered to take over the work of responsibility for security around the parliament when Israeli troops withdraw from there Tuesday morning.

UN ENVOY CALLS FOR END TO ISRAELI AGGRESSION

OW180308 Beijing XINHUA in English 0248 GMT 18 Aug 82

[Text] United Nations, August 17 (XINHUA) -- China's deputy permanent representative to the United Nations Mi Guojun today urged the United Nations to adopt firm and effective measures, including sanctions against Israel in order to put an immediate end to its aggression against the Palestinian and other Arab peoples.

Speaking at the resumed seventh emergency special session of the General Assembly on Palestine, he pointed out that the Israeli invasion of Lebanon was designed "to annihilate the Palestine Liberation Organisation, exterminate the struggle of the Palestinian people for national rights and undermine the search for a comprehensive and just solution to the Middle East question."

Israeli's aggression resulted in the gross violation of the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Lebanon and the tragic death of countless innocent civilians in Lebanon, the Chinese representative said.

He stressed that "it is a well-known fact that, in unleashing this war of aggression, Israel has been aided, abetted and shielded by the United States Government." "For the deterioration of the Middle East situation and the serious consequences created by Israel's aggression, the United States has unshakeable responsibility."

He observed that the worsening of the Middle East situation has serious implications not only on the region but also on international peace and security.

Mi Guojun expressed the belief that although there were temporary military set-backs, the liberation struggle of the Palestinian people "is not to be put out, nor will their cause for liberation be put to an end." "They will continue to charge forward relentlessly to carry on their heroic struggle and will certainly win final victory," he declared.

PLO OBSERVER DENOUNCES ISRAEL, U.S. AT UN

[Text] United Nations, August 16 (XINHUA) -- The Israeli invasion of Lebanon was designed to "liquidate" the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) militarily and to turn Lebanon into a "dependent state," said Faruq Qaddumi, PLO observer to the U.N. here today. Qaddumi was speaking at the U.N. General Assembly's seventh emergency special session which was called to discuss the extremely serious situation in Lebanon with thousands of Palestinian guerrillas trapped in west Beirut.

He reaffirmed PLO's determination to defend itself against the Israeli aggression. He said that the Palestinians were ready to leave Beirut because they did not want to "divide and partition" Lebanon, but they would not allow the aggressor to reap the "fruits of its aggression." He also accused the United States of its support for Israel, saying that the U.S. could not be an "honest negotiator" in the Middle East as long as it did not recognize the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people. He noted that the solution to the Lebanon issue lay in the full and unconditional withdrawal of Israeli troops from Lebanon.

Addressing the meeting, Massamba Sarre (Senegal), chairman of the committee on the exercise of the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people, pointed out that the Israeli war of aggression against Lebanon had caused immense suffering to thousands of Palestinians and Lebanese civilians. The only way to bring an end to "this tragedy" was the withdrawal of Israeli troops from all occupied territories and the re-establishment of the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people, he stressed.

Egyptian representative Amre M. Mussa stressed that Israel was under obligation to renounce its policy of annexation and expansion and to recognize the rights of the Palestinian people. The conflict in the Middle East would be solved only when the Palestinians and the Israelis recognized each other, he added.

In their speeches, Cuban and Japanese representatives condemned the Israeli expansion and urged Israel to withdraw from Lebanon as soon as possible in compliance with the relevant United Nations resolutions.

EGYPT'S GHALI FAULTS U.S. FOR ISRAELI INVASION

[Text] Brussels, August 17 (XINHUA) -- Egyptian Minister of State for Foreign Affairs Butrus Ghali said the U.S. attitude has encouraged Israel's adventurous invasion of Lebanon. Ghali made the remark in an interview with a correspondent of the LA LIBRE BELGIQUE in Cairo. The interview was made public by the newspaper today.

He said the Israeli invasion has endangered the peace process (in Middle East). He said the United States should make precise commitments to the settlement of the issue of Palestine. The commitments should include an explicit statement on the self-determination right of the Palestinians and clear commitment concerning the future of the West Bank, Gaza Strip and east Jerusalem, he added.

Referring to the possibility of Egypt's acceptance of the Palestinians retreating from Beirut, Ghali said: "So long as the United States is unwilling to give us assurance, we will refuse to accept them." But, "Egypt is ready to welcome a Palestinian provisional government to settle down in Cairo," he added.

CEAUSESCU URGES HALT TO ISRAELI MILITARY ACTION

[Text] Bucharest, August 16 (XINHUA) -- Romanian President Nicolae Ceausescu stressed that at present Israel's military actions should be stopped and an all-round ceasefire guaranteed so as to create conditions for military disengagement and Israeli withdrawal from Beirut and Lebanon. He made the statement in a recent interview with a correspondent of the Egyptian paper MAY.

He said that the Beirut question should be resolved as part of an all-round solution to the Lebanese and Palestinian questions. Romania holds, the president said, that it is necessary now to convene an international conference with the participation of all countries concerned including the Palestine Liberation Organization to solve the Palestine question on the basis of the Palestinian people's right to self-determination and to establishing an independent Palestinian state. The United Nations, the United States, the Soviet Union and all permanent members of the Security Council should play an active role in convening such an international conference and resolving the Palestine question.

Referring to the summit of the Arab countries, the president said that under the present circumstances, Arab countries should overcome their differences, strengthen their cooperation and make united efforts to seek a solution to the Lebanese and Palestine questions.

On the Iran-Iraq conflict, Ceausescu said that his country did not and does not want to mediate this conflict, but holds that both countries should withdraw their troops back to their pre-war boundaries and solve their dispute through peaceful negotiations, he said.

ARMYMEN SEIZE CONTROL OF SEYCHELLES STATE RADIO

[Text] Beijing, August 17 (XINHUA) -- A group of armymen in the Seychelles seized control of the state radio station in Victoria at dawn today, claiming that the aim of the mutiny was not to overthrow the present government but ask for the dismissal of some high-ranking officers, according to reports from the capital of the Seychelles.

The mutinous troops imposed a 24-hour curfew on the Mahe Island where the government is located.

A communique broadcast by radio Seychelles today said: "All public and vital installations and the radio station are mined and should any soldiers, be they local or foreign, try to foil the coup, the buildings will be blown up right away."

Another broadcast said that the mutinous troops were still loyal to President Rene who was on an inspection tour of the Amirante Islands southwest of the Mahe Island.

[Text] Dar Es Salaam, August 17 (XINHUA) -- President Rene of the Seychelles has ordered the soldiers who had seized the national radio station earlier today and held more than 200 hostages to surrender, radio Tanzania reported tonight. The mutineers took over radio Seychelles to press for the removal of two senior army officers and two Cabinet ministers.

President Rene, back to the capital of Victoria, established telephone contact with the mutineers, asking them to lay down arms and release the hostages. The president has reportedly refused to give in to any of their demands.

Rene was reportedly to be vacationing on the outer island of Amirante at the time of the takeover. He returned home tonight following the action of the mutinous troops who threatened to take "drastic action" against the hostages, it was reported.

KYODO CITES WAN LI ON ABOLISHING CPC CHAIRMANSHIP

OW180855 Tokyo KYODO in English 0849 GMT 18 Aug 82

[Text] Beijing, Aug 18 (KYODO) -- The Chinese Communist Party will abolish the posts of party chairman and vice chairmen and create the post of party secretary general at its congress next month, Vice Premier Wan Li told a Japanese theater group Wednesday.

His statement led observers to believe that party Chairman Hu Yaobang will be elected secretary general at the coming 12th congress opening September.

The observers also believe that, out of the six vice chairmen, four aged men -- Ye Jianying, Deng Xiaoping, Li Xiannian and Chen Yun -- will resign and be named to a new advisers committee.

Thus, the coming congress is expected to be an important one to carry out drastic organizational changes and shift of the party leadership to younger people, they said.

Vice Premier Wan Li disclosed the plan for the new collective party leadership under the secretary general when he met with a visiting Japanese Bunraku puppet troupe.

Referring to strongman Deng Xiaoping, now party vice chairman, Wan said Deng would probably not become the head of state, but would not be able to avoid the military task. This remark was viewed as suggesting that Deng will be named chairman of the State Military Commission, which is expected to be created under a revised state constitution.

Wan told the Japanese that Deng is continuing to advise on major diplomatic and domestic matters. This also suggests that Deng will play a strong guiding role as doyen even after becoming an advisers committee member.

Wan said that, after the constitutional amendments, the head of state and one deputy head of state will be named, but he did not mention potential candidates for these posts.

The abolition of the party chairman and vice chairmen would lead to abolition of the current Standing Committee of the party Politburo, the observers predict.

Considering the age factor, Premier Zhao Ziyang and party Vice Chairman Huo Guofeng would not join the newly created advisers committee, they believe. Premier Zhao is likely to remain in his post and Hua, former party chairman, retained as Politburo member, the observers predict.

RENMIN RIBAO URGES RESTUDYING 'COMBAT LIBERALISM'

HK171045 Beiing RENMIN RIBAO in Chinese 17 Aug 82 p 4

[Article by Yue Ping [1471 1627]: "Study Again 'Combat Liberalism'"]

[Text] Forty-five year ago Comrade Mao Zedong wrote the article "Combat Liberalism," making a penetrating analysis of the liberal tendencies within the party. Over a long period of time in the past, this article has always been our important weapon for combating erroneous ideas. Today, to strengthen the ideological and politcal unity of the whole party, enhance the sense of organization and discipline and overcome laxness and weakness in certain party organizations, it is absolutely necessary to study this important article again.

What is liberalism? Comrade Mao Zedong said in his article: "Liberalism rejects ideological struggle and stands for unprincipled peace." This correctly summarizes the basic characteristics of liberalism. This is also the crucial point of the 11 manifestations of liberalism enumerated in the article.

Comrade Mao Zedong pointed out that combating liberal tendencies "is one of the tasks on our ideological front." This remains true today. At present, liberal tendencies within our party mainly manifest themselves in the following two aspects. First, they manifest themselves in the words and deeds of some Communist Party members and party-member cadres. For instance, some of them adopt an arbitrary attitude toward the line, guiding principles and policies of the party, and pursue them if they are to their liking; otherwise, they refuse to follow them, or even do as they please. They publish articles in newspapers and periodicals and openly and arbitrarily utter remarks which run counter to the four basic principles and the spirit of the CPC Central Committee. They violate the organizational principle of the party and are keen on forming small circles and pursuing factionalism. Instead of following the correct path, they take the wrong one and indulge in petty and mean actions. They pay too much attention to remuneration while doing their work, turn a blind eye to party discipline and refuse to accept arrangements made by the party organizations. They disregard the party constitution and "principles," turn a deaf ear to the repeated warnings of the party organizations, and continue to pursue their unhealthy practice and the "study of relationships." They are fond of inquiring about internal news and let out party secrets arbitrarily. It is appropriate to say that the manifestations of liberalism enumerated in the article "Combat Liberalism" now still exist within the party, and some are still fairly conspicuous.

Second, liberalism also manifests itself in the attitude of certain party organizations and their responsible persons toward the shortcomings and mistakes of party members and cadres. They fail to take a clear-cut stand to severely deal with the erroneous words and deeds as well as acts of violating laws and principles on the part of some Communist Party members and party-member cadres in particular. They fail to educate and criticize them or handle their cases in spite of the fact that they deserve punishment. They even shield and harbor them. In some units, when problems and opinions arise among comrades, no efforts are exterted to deal with them aboveboard and at party meetings. Instead of carrying out sincere discussions and encouraging heart-to-heart talks, people gossip in private. Therefore, contradictions cannot be solved expeditiously, but become more and more complicated.

Liberalism is very harmful. Comrade Mao Zedong profoundly stressed that liberalism "is corrosion which eats away at unity, undermines cohesion, causes apathy and creates dissension. It robs the revolutionary ranks of compact organization and strict discipline, prevents policies from being carried through and alienates the party organizations from the masses which the party leads." In a long speech delivered by Comrade Chen Yun in November 1942 at a meeting of the northwest bureau of the CPC Central Committee on party consolidation which was attended by senior cadres, he devoted a section to combating liberalism. While talking about the essence and harmfulness of liberalism, he pointed out: "What is the essence of liberalism? I believe that it actually encourages wrongdoing, bad things and bad people. This erroneous idea is extremely harmful to cadres and cannot play the role of educating them. It can only harm people and the party." In our life, the corrosive role of liberalism is obvious. In some units, people are dilatory in doing things, discipline is lax, the party line is not conscientiously implemented, comrades do not live in harmony, unhealthy trends and evil practices are gaining ground, and so forth. All this is closely connected with liberalism. The reason laxness and weakness occur in some party organizations is mainly because of liberalism.

Criticism and self-criticism is one of our party's three work styles, as well as a powerful weapon for raising ideological understanding, strengthening unity and improving work. But liberalism rejects criticism and struggle. There exist in our ranks many contradictions which can be resolved at their source through criticism and self-criticism. However, it is difficult to carry out criticism and self-criticism in some places. When hearing criticism, some people have a strong aversion to it. They either resist or oppose it. Sometimes, they even stamp with fury. There are still others who dare not criticize wrong speeches, unhealthy trends and evil practices, or cannot carry out criticism justly and forecefully. Here, liberalism is at work. Therefore, it is necessary for us to restore the fine work style of carrying out criticism and self-criticism if we are determined to combat liberalism.

If we adopt a liberalist attitude toward some unhealthy deeds and evil practices without conducting education, criticism and interference, they will become more serious. If we do not seriously criticize the mistakes of the cadres and party members and educate them, but adopt a liberalist attitude of letting them proceed along a wrong road, it will lead to disastrous consequences, just like Zhuge Liang beheading his favorite general Ma Su because of Ma's fatal mistake. This is, of course, not the real concern for the cadres.

The current existence of liberalism within the party is a passive reflection of the excessive struggle previously waged under the guidance of "leftist" thinking, as well as an impact produced by the anarchic undisciplined and unorganized state of affairs in the period of the 10-year chaos. Nevertheless, just as Comrade Mao Zedong pointed out: Liberalism "puts individual interest in the first place and revolutionary interest in the second place." Today's liberalism is also linked with individualism. Therefore, the basic method to eliminate liberalism is still raising communist ideological understanding and overcoming various kinds of individualism.

CPC MILITARY COMMISSION COMMENDS AIR FORCE CADRE

[Excerpts] Beijing, 17 Aug (XINHUA) -- The Military Commission of the CPC Central Committee recently issued an order on conferring the honor title "a good cadre who wholeheartedly served the people" on Fan Shengwen, former political commissar of a PLA Air Force farm.

The order says: During his more than 30 years in the service, Comrade Fan Shengwen placed the interests of the party above everything else at all times, did whatever the party asked him to do and wholeheartedly served the people. After he was transferred to the air force farm in the great northern wilderness [in northeast China] in 1967, he voluntarily requested to stay there longer. He set strict demands on himself, made himself an example to others in everything, united and led the cadres and fighters in hard struggle for 14 years and greatly improved the situation of the farm. In 1979 he had a heart disease, but he still worked selflessly, disregarding his safety. On 3 May 1981 his illness became worse and he almost fainted at the worksite. On 6 May 1981 he held a cadres meeting to arrange work despite intense pain in his chest. His heartbeat stopped less than 19 minutes after he left the conference room. He thus worked for the party's cause until his last breath.

The order says: Comrade Fan Shengwen was a good party member and a good cadre who was nurtured and educated by the party and Mao Zedong Thought. He was a good example of wholeheartedly serving the people.

The Military Commission of the CPC Central Committee calls on all PLA commanders and fighters, particularly the party members and cadres, to follow Comrade Fan Shengwen's example, seriously study Marxism-Leninism and Mao Zedong Thought, make greater efforts to temper themselves in proletarian party spirit and persistently remold their subjective world in the course of changing the objective world. It urges the commanders and fighters to constantly use the weapon of criticism and self-criticism to struggle against individualist thinking, firmly foster the communist world outlook, further inspire revolutionary enthusiasm, strive to be glorious pacesetters in the establishment of socialist spiritual civilization and contribute all their strength to the building of a powerful, modernized and regularized revolutionary army and to the construction and defense of our socialist motherland.

RENMIN RIBAO DISCUSSES BUILDING MATERIAL INDUSTRY

[Editorial: "Open Up a New Phase of the Building Material Industry"]

[Text] Among the four basic necessities of the people's material life -- food, clothing, shelter and transportation -- the latter two have the most important bearing on the building material industry. Transportation involves building and maintaining roads, brigades and ports, which gives rise to a great demand for building materials, particularly cement. Shelter means building houses, which also requires various building materials. In the last few years, various branches of our country's building material industry, especially cement, plate glass, ceramic sanitary ware, bricks and tiles, waterproof material, thermal insulation material, and so on have developed to various extents. However, they are still lagging behind an ever growing demand.

One of the important tasks laid before our nation's building material industry is to vigorously open up a new phase of the industry and to try to develop the various branches of the building material industry in a coordinated way, promote the production of major building materials and thus solve the longstanding shortage of building materials within a short period of time.

In order to speed up the development of the building material industry, we must uphold the principle of standing on two feet and fully mobilize the initiative of various circles, including all local and central departments concerned. The building material industry is an industry which needs a high degree of technique and depends on local conditions to a great extent. According to the regulations of the present state system, we must combine central administration with the local administration in developing the building material industry. Stress must be placed on local administration so as to mobilize more effectively the initiative of local units, including the peasants. In order to push the building material industry forward, we must deliberate and formulate specific policies in light of actual circumstances, adopting different measures for different trades and different products and avoiding practices of "demanding uniformity." Since building materials are in short supply at present, various localities are really keen to develop the building material industry. They have already worked out some new methods to pool funds and jointly establish plants. We must study and investigate the new situation, sum up experiences, make the best use of the situation, eliminate the malpractices and carry forward the strong points of the new methods, affirm those practices which have proved to be correct and eliminate shortcomings, and thus constantly improve and perfect the existing system. We must especially study and work out the policies concerning raising of funds and distribution of products, take the interests of all parties into account and adopt various methods such as joint management, compensation trade, advance payment, and so on, so as to enable the production of building materials to develop more rapidly.

Now, most building materials are in short supply. Over a long period of time in the past, we mainly concentrated our attention on quantity while failing to attach enough importance to product quality. With an improvement in the people's living standard and development of modern construction, the demand for quality, design and varieties of products will be greater. At present, the quality of many building materials produced in our country is inferior, high-grade products are limited, their design is poor and varieties are very few. The present development level of the building material industry can hardly meet social needs and is far behind the world's advanced level. We must make the improvement of the quality of building materials an important task. On the one hand, we must try hard to improve the quality of old products and strictly carry out quality control according to quality standard, and on the other hand, in order to meet the needs of modern construction and industrial and agricultural production, we must try our best to develop new designs and new varieties, and promote and create name-brand products which preserve the traditional national style. Building material departments in various localities must select some plants with the capability to produce high-grade products, so as to fulfill demands at home as well as to strengthen the competitive power of our products in the world market.

We hope that after a few years' efforts the quality of our country's building materials will be greatly improved, the designs and varieties increased, and thus the various needs arising from national development and the people's daily life gradually fulfilled.

We must strengthen the leadership of the building material industry. Recently, in the organizational reform of State Council organs, the former department of building material industry was merged into the national economic committee and a national building material industry bureau was established. So the building material industry department's relationship with its superior and subordinate organs, the department's organizational structure and its administrative system have undergone a relatively great change which may facilitate the solving of many specific problems in the development of the building material industry. The purpose of the organizational reform is to more effectively enhance efficiency. Therefore, we should not slow down the production of building materials and capital construction at present because of organizational reform. Now, the national building material industry bureau has taken over the tasks and the jurisdiction of the former department of building material industry, and exercises leadership and administration over the building material industry and nonmetallurgical mining industry throughout the country. The building material industry bureaus of various provinces, municipalities and autonomous regions must properly administer the building material industry and the nonmetallurgical mining industry in their own provinces, municipalities and autonomous regions, and exercise leadership over the building material industry (including building material industrial enterprises run by communes, brigades and other organs) in all aspects, ranging from planning and policymaking to technical matters and so on.

GONGREN RIBAO VIEWS ROLE, CONTRIBUTIONS OF WOMEN

[Article by Ma Xiaoyue [7456 2556 2588]: "The Role of Women Must Not Be Underestimated"]

[Text] In his article "Giving More Importance to Boys Than to Girls," Comrade Jie Gang belittled the role of women, as if women are not worth a penny. He used such terms as "having no far-reaching ideals" and "breadth of vision" to show that women are merely an appendage to men. How absurd this fallacy is!

In the history of the Chinese nation, there have been countless heroines who have made indelible contributions to the independence of the nation and the prosperity of the motherland. Huang Daopo, the famous cotton-spining innovator, was one of them in ancient times. She was a child bride before she left home for some other villages and became a spinning girl. After dozens of years of practice, she blazed a new trail in the cotton-spinning handicraft industry. She then came back to her hometown with the new cotton-spinning techniques and thus brought about great changes in the backward situation there. After she died, her hometown became a cotton-spinning center for the whole country. This was chiefly because of her contributions. Even now, some folk songs praising her deeds are still on the lips of the people of her home village, songs such as "Huang Daopo Teaches Me Spinning; Huang Daopo Teaches Me Weaving; Two Bolts of Cloth, Two Bobbins."

Qiu Jin is an example in modern history. She personally witnessed the humiliation and persecution the feudal moral principles imposed on women. In order to encourage her sisters to learn science, strive for independence and cast off the yoke of feudalism, she held high the great banner of women's emancipation and personally led armed uprising. She finally devoted her life to the lofty cause of antifeudalism and striving for democracy and national emancipation.

Today the Chinese women's volleyball team commands more admiration. In order to bring honor to the motherland and realize the behests of Premier Zhou Enlai and Vice Premier He Long that China make great efforts to bring about an upswing in the "three big balls," the members of the team made indomitable and courageous efforts in the world championship cut for the motherland. With their brilliant achievements, they announced to the whole world that the Chinese nation is confident and capable of standing on its own feet in the family of nations.

Who said that women are good for nothing? Who said that women have not made contributions to mankind? We women are masters of the new era and are an indispensable force in transforming the world and propelling history forward.

Gorki said: Without the sun, the flowers would not blossom; without love, there would not be happiness; without women, there would not be love. Without mothers, there would be neither poets nor heroes. This is a forceful refutation of the ideology characterized by "Giving More Importance to Boys Than to Girls."

[Excerpts] Beijing, 16 Aug (XINHUA) -- The Second Plenary Session of the Sixth Jiu San Society Central Committee opened in Beijing this morning. Xu Deheng, chairman of the Jiu San Society Central Committee, delievered an opening speech. He called on all members of the Jiu San Society and the intellectuals with whom they have contact to take China's development as their duty, display the spirit of a "silkworm that keeps spinning silk until its death," conscientiously and quietly immerse themselves in hard work, contribute their knowledge and specialities, and make still greater efforts toward completion of the Chinese people's three great tasks.

In his opening speech, Xu Deheng said: Since the 3d Plenary Session of the 11th CPC Central Committee, China has been experiencing a new situation with political stability, unity and steady economic development. At present, the political and economic situations in China are better than anticipated. The patriotic united front has been consolidated and developed.

He urged the members of the Jiu San Society to view their achievements in the past 2 or 3 years to strengthen their confidence, and, at the same time, to know their shortcomings and make improvements in order to continue to advance. He also urged them to play a still greater role as an assistant to the CPC and greet the 12th CPC National Congress with action in a spirit of "showing utter devotion to each other and sharing honor and disgrace" as proposed by Comrade Hu Yaobang.

Since the first plenary session of its sixth Central Committee, the Jiu San Society has restored or established 42 local organizations and 421 primary organizations, and recruited 2,800 new members.

At today's opening session, Zhou Peiyuan, vice chairman of the Jiu San Society Central Committee, delivered a work report.

HUNAN READJUSTS STRUCTURE OF AGRICULTURE

HK180255 Changsha Hunan Provincial Service in Mandarin 1100 GMT 16 Aug 82

[Text] Since the 3d Plenary Session of the 11th CPC Central Committee, Hunan Province has conscientiously implemented the agricultural policy formulated by the central authorities, vigorously readjusted the internal structure of agriculture and achieved marked results. Hunan is a province that is 70 percent mountainous area, 10 percent rivers and lakes and 20 percent farmland. It is rich in natural resources. The principle of never delaying the production of grain while actively developing the diversified economy in agriculture laid down by the party Central Committee has pointed out the orientation for the overall development of agriculture. During the past 3 years, Hunan Province has conscientiously implemented and put into practice this principle from the top to the grassroots and has paid due attention to summing up the experience of those living in the mountains depending on the mountains and those living by the lakes depending on the water. The province has established the idea of running agriculture on a large scale, broadened its horizons and insisted on grasping together the mountains, lakes and farmland and promoting together agriculture, animal husbandry, sideline products and fisheries, and developed the range and depth of production. In the past few years, although there have been suitable readjustments in the grain-growing area, due to the establishment of the system of production responsibility and the popularity of scientific techniques, the per area unit and total grain yield both increased. In the past 3 years, the province readjusted on a large scale, the cultivation of cotton and industrial crops and expanded the cultivation area of some industrial crops. In order to develop the diversified economy, the province has allocated 820 million jin of grain and 270 million yuan of capital to develop the diversified economy and has established some bases for this. The mountainous regions take advantage of abundant grass and mountains while developing forestry on a large scale, and actively developing animal husbandry as well. The province has carried out a general survey of grassland resources and also launched the utilization and transformation of grassland in a planned way. Thus, the herbivorous animals have shown new development. Last year, the output value of herbivorous animals increased from 25.7 to 27.5 percent of total animal husbandry output value. The total output value of animal husbandry was 15 percent of the total output value of agriculture. Fishery production has recently been put on the agenda. The party committees and government of a number of prefectures and counties have grasped fishery as they do grain, and made use of waters as they do farmland. Aquatic production has taken a new step forward. Since the third plenary session, the aquatic production on the whole province has taken three great steps in 3 years, increasing production by 400,000 dan every year, an average rate of increase of 17.6 percent a year. Through readjustment in the past few years, the internal structure of agriculture has started to show gratifying changes. The total output value of the diversified economy increased from 45.3 percent of the total output value of agriculture in 1978 to 49.3 percent in 1981. The whole countryside is full of life and vigor, and the development of agriculture is on the way up.

BRIEFS

HUNAN PROMOTES DIVERSIFICATION -- Over the past 3 years since the 3d Plenary Session of 11th CPC Central Committee, Hunan Province has developed diversification very quickly and achieved gratifying results. The output value from diversification in the province last year accounted for 49.3 percent of the total agricultural output value and was some 4.834 billion yuan, which was 20.2 percent more than in 1978. The value of output of diversification in the province in the first half of this year was 12.1 percent more than in the first half of last year. Since the 3d Plenary Session of the 11th CPC Central Committee, all prefectures and counties in the provinces have taken such measures as are suitable to local conditions, to build some 200 relatively big bases for the production of cotton, ramie, jute, bluish dogbane, sugarcane, flue-cured tobacco, oranges, tangerines, cocoons, tea-oil trees, tung oil trees, livestock and aquatic products. By the end of last year, the amount of commune members' savings was some 690 million yuan, which was some 490 million more yuan than in the corresponding period of 1978. SHANXI'S HUO SHILIAN ON SOLVING DROUGHT PROBLEM

[Text] In April and May I spent about a month touring counties in the Xishan area and the plains in southern Shanxi. In talking about the situation of agricultural production, most of the cadres and the masses in various counties said: The policies are good and the people are working hard; the rest is up to the weather. Indeed, they are right. With the establishment of various kinds of production responsibility systems, the peasants enthusiasm in production is unprecedented and production is developing very fast. However, as far as natural conditions are concerned, there are droughts in our province 9 years out of 10. Droughts remain an important factor affecting steady high yields in our province's agricultural production. For many years, grain output and the output of other crops have fluctuated in proportion to the seriousness of droughts. Let us take for example the spring sowing this year. In the beginning, many localities in the Xishan area were so dry that it was impossible to sow, and plains in southern Shanxi were so dry that cotton plants did not sprout. People were listening to weather forecasts every day and were anxious to have rain. Later, rain fell and the situation became less serious.

This leads to a very important question that needs serious study and prompt solution: How should we set about our work according to the present situation and with the future in mind, lead the masses in gradually increasing the ability to resist droughts and basing our province's agriculture on steady development now that the enthusiasm for production of the masses has already been aroused? I would like to talk about this question in light of what I saw in the Xishan area and in the plains in southern Shanxi.

We have many experiences and lessons in solving the drought problem. For many years, people have been accustomed to building water conservation projects to resist drought and asking for funds from the state for those projects. It must be admitted that it is necessary to build an appropriate number of water conservation projects. We have also made great achievements in water conservation work in our province. The reason why output has been more stable and the rate of fluctuation has gradually diminished in the past few years is closely related to water conservation work. However, practice has proved that building water conservation projects alone cannot solve the drought problem in our province and that depending entirely on the state for funds in building water conservation projects is even less practical. The reasons are: First, the state's financial resources are limited at present and it is impossible to have a large sum of money for building water conservation projects. Second, our province is short of water resources. In some localities, even if we have money, we cannot get much water. Most of the farmland in the Xishan area is on slopes. According to statistics for Jiaokou, Shilou, Yonghe and Daning Counties, farmland on slopes accounts for over 80 percent. The water table in Fenxi County is usually over 100 meters underground and there are only small streams and brooks with a flow rate of only 0.12 cubic meters per second on the surface. In these localities, it is even difficult to get drinking water for men and domestic animals, much less is it possible to get water for farmland. On the plains in southern Shanxi, water resources are even less. In history, the Fen He River was a big river on which big ships could sail. But at present, it often dries up. In the past few years, the water level of Quwo County, which is located in the Fen He Valley, has dropped by 5-8 meters and the groundwater can no longer be exploited for lack of replenishment. Third, some water conservation projects built in the past do not work because of water shortage. On my trip I found many wells and reservoirs already dry. Fourth, the drought problem is not limited to shortage of water. In the final analysis, it is a comprehensive reflection of soil erosion, scanty vegetation, uneven rainfall and ecological imbalance. Therefore, building water conservation projects alone is not a fundamental solution to the drought problem.

What then is the correct policy in solving the drought problem in our province? The correct policy should be placing the soil problem in the most important position and tackling problems of soil, water and forestry in a comprehensive way. This policy was put forth at a meeting to discuss water and soil conservation in six provinces and regions in the middle reaches of the Huanghe River which was held in Yanan in 1973 and was approved by Chairman Mao and Premier Zhou. Practice has proved that this policy is correct. Quite a number of counties in our province participated in this meeting. Unfortunately, we did not go ahead and implement the spirit of this meeting in our province. Many good examples and experiences in the capital construction of land have not been extensively popularized. Therefore, it is quite necessary to restudy this question and advocate with great efforts the policy of placing the soil problem in the most important position and tackling problems of soil, water and forestry in a comprehensive way.

Putting soil in the most important position means seriously doing a good job in farmland capital construction and adopting a series of biological, engineering and farming measures. The most important thing is to work on existing farmland — mainly to try our utmost to level the land and to plow it as deep as 1 foot to 1 foot 2 inches. In some localities, we may proceed from reality and gradually increase the depth of plowing. Leveling and deep-plowing do not need state investment and everybody, man and woman, young and old, can do the work. In places where the area of farmland per capita is 2-3 mu, if each household can level and plow 3 mu of land each year on average, the existing farmland will all become "sponge land" in 3-5 years. After this, deep-plowing once every 3 years can be continued for a long time to come.

Leveling and deep-plowing produce instant effects. In the past, typical examples of changing low-yield land into high-yield land within 2-3 years were found in dry localities. The most important thing they did was to tackle the soil problem with utmost efforts. At present, some high-yield production brigades and communes also begin by leveling land. In Lancun production brigade, Zhibeizhuang Commune Xinjiang County, as a result of attaching importance to improving land through mechanical plowing, manual deep-plowing and using more fertilizer, the output of over 3,000 mu of nonirrigated wheat fields reached 349 jin per mu. One thousand mu of these fields are on a slope. In the past, the output from them was only several dozen jin and they were practically barren land. Last year, their output abruptly rose to over 300 jin per mu.

Leveling and deep-plowing can conserve the soil and store up moisture. This is actually a way to construct "reservoirs in soil." The annual rainfall in the Xishan area and on plains in southern Shanxi is usually around 500 millimeters. If this rainfall is fully utilized, it can basically meet the needs of the plants growth. The problem is that the rainy seasons vary greatly. It seldom rains in spring and summer when the crops grow, whereas during the plowing season, floods often occur as a result of concentrated rainfall. After leveling and deep-plowing, the capacity of the soil to absorb and retain moisture and water will be greatly increased. This will mitigate the contradiction to a certain extent. The masses call it storing up autumn for spring use. The Dongguanzhuang production brigade in Wenxi County is a typical example of striving for high yields from nonirrigated fields. It attaches importance to improving the soil and is good at storing up autumn for spring use. If we do not try to improve the physical conditions of soil, only a very thin layer of it can grow crops. In dry spells, the crops will wither and in rainy seasons, soil erosion occurs. According to statistics complied by Shilou County, the annual volume of silt carried away amounts to 19.7 million tons. Together with the silt, a lot of organic substances are also carried away. This is a problem common in all counties in the Xishan area.

While improving the physical conditions of soil, we must also use more fertilizer before we can effectively increase the ability to resist droughts.

We must use as much organic fertilizer as possible in order to increase the percentage of organic substances in the soil. This is an important aspect in increasing the farmland's ability to store up water. We must put the stalks and straws back into the fields. We must also use green manure and farm-yard manure. Much coal is produced in our province. We must be good at turning this to our advantage. We must use coal as fuel whenever we can instead of using stalks and straws. We must change the traditional custom of using stalks and straws as fuel. By putting the stalks and straws back into the soil and using more green manure and farm-yard manure, the structure of soil will be improved, the percentage of organic substances in it will increase and its ability to resist droughts will also increase. If we use stalks and straws to feed domestic animals and then use the animals' excrement as manure, we are returning ferlilizer to the fields or "returning to the fields the stalks and straws which have been excreted by animals." Making use of stalks and straws in this way will bring about even greater economic returns.

Of course, the final solution to the drought problem can only be the outcome of tackling the problem in a comprehensive way. In addition to doing a good job in the capital construction of land, we must also attach importance to the development of water conservation work and forestry.

We must sum up past experiences and lessons in water conservation work and must grasp firmly the following principles:

1) In addition to large and medium-sized projects assigned by the state, localities should mainly build small ones or build projects mainly by depending on the masses. In places where water is scarce, we must sink more water-retention wells and ponds to store up water. This is an effective method. Fenxi County has planned to sink 2,000 water-retention wells this year and is determined to achieve an average of 1 well per household in 3 years. This is a good way to store up rain water for men and animals. In places where conditions are favorable, small water conservation projects may also be built.

2) We must use our funds in a concentrated way and pay attention to economic returns. In building water conservation projects, we must ensure that state investment is used only on key projects in a concentrated way and must not divide it equally among various projects. It should be used in places where there are plenty of water sources and in projects that do not need much money but produce instant effect and high economy returns. If we can still tap potential from old projects or transform and improve them, we should try to avoid building new ones. If it is really necessary to build new projects, we must first carry out careful prospecting and surveys, make scientific analysis on their economic returns, listen to views from different sectors and act cautiously.

3) We must pay attention to saving water and rationally using water. At present, while we are talking about shortage of water, we are wasting water terribly. The people in many localities have told me that 80 cubic meters of water are needed to water 1 mu of land. In some places, over 100 cubic meters are needed. Even in places which are economical, some 60 cubic meters are still needed. As a matter of fact, only 40 cubic meters are enough. The reason why water is wasted is because the fields are not level and the irrigation system is not complete. In some places, the fields are not even divided and the incoming water makes a mess of them. If we can reduce the amount of water needed for 1 mu of land fro 80 cubic meters to 40 cubic meters, we will actually expand the area of irrigated land by 100 percent. The key to reducing the amount of water used still lies in earnestly doing a good job of leveling land, making irrigation systems complete and organically integrating the work of tackling the water problem with that or tackling the soil problem.

Developing forestry is a strategic measure to regulate weather, maintain ecological balance, solve the drought problem and control soil erosion.

This spring, enthusiasm in planting trees in various localities was unprecedented and the afforested area was larger than any preceding year. We should sum up the experiences in various localities and handle appropriately the following relationships:

1. We must depend on the masses and must not depend on the state for money. Forms of organization in afforestation in various localities vary: voluntary tree-planting, tree-planting by specialized teams and tree-planting by individual commune members. The specialized tree-planting teams in Puxian County also run sideline production. They support themselves with sideline production and are self-sufficient. Some tree-planting centers in Jixian Country combine the work of specialized teams with mass movement. They make overall planning, assign each unit with the responsibility for a certain section and join separate batches of afforested land into a vast expanse. Although methods adopted in various localities are different, there are common aspects in places which have done a good job. They do not depend on money provided by the state but depend on the masses. They pay attention to organizing state and collective tree-planting teams but they pay even greater attention to mobilizing thousands of households to do the work. They allocate a portion of barren hills to commune members and let them manage it by themselves. They can have what they plant and this principle will not change for a long time to come. In this way, their tasks are clear, their sense of responsibility is strong, the survival rate is high and management is good. Hejin County allocates a portion of barren land suitable for planting trees to the commune members and their enthusiasm in planting trees is greatly raised. This spring, the average number of trees planted by individuals was 1,137,000. In places where conditions are favorable, we may set up a number of specialized tree-planting households.

In some counties, the state's funds for afforestation are given to commune members according to the number of trees they plant. Some counties give tree saplings freely to commune members. This is not really relying on the masses but a way of bestowing favors. In the past, the state provided funds and the peasants planted trees. Trees were planted year after year but no trees could be seen afterwards. The reason was that we did not rely on the masses. This is a lesson which we should draw. Of course, this does not mean that afforestation does not need state investment. In cultivating shelter-forest, for example, we must depend on state investment.

2. Of the two things, growing seedlings and planting trees, we must first grasp well the former. Growing seedlings is the most important link in the process of afforestation. Many localities reflected that not enough saplings were supplied this spring. Some localities had to purchase saplings from distant places. In some localities, saplings under 3 years old were transplanted. This greatly affected the survival rate. We must make an effort to do a good job in growing seedlings. Not only state specialized tree-planting teams must enlarge their nurseries, but administrative organs, schools, factories, mines and enterprises must also take the lead in setting up nurseries. They must also actively assist production teams and commune members to set up nurseries. Afforestation subsidies allocated by the Province to various prefectures and counties and funds raised by various prefectures and counties themselves should mainly be used on setting up and improving nurseries. Only in this way can we guarantee the needs for large-scale tree-planting.

3. Viewed from the whole province, we must at present stress planting trees around houses, villages, by the roadside, and around water rather than planting trees on barren hills. In mountainous districts, both must be stressed. Planting trees around houses, villages, by the roadside and around water can be done at low cost. The survival rate is high and the trees can grow quickly into useful timber. With several years' efforts, many villages have taken on a new look and are hidden among trees. We must strive to attain the goal of planting 100 trees per capita as an average. If each person can really plant 100 trees around houses, villages, by the roadside and around water apart from those planted on barren hills, this will be a considerable figure.

In making barren hills green, we must plant high trees as well as low bushes, trees as well as grass. It is not realistic to plant trees over all barren hills within a short period of time. While planting trees, we must protect and increase bushes such as brambles and thistles.

We may also plant grass in places which are suited to growing grass for developing animal husbandry. We must strictly forbid destroying forests or grass to open up wasteland and forbid damaging vegetation.

We must set about fundamentally solving the drought problem and at the same time pay attention to economic returns and combine long-term interests with immediate ones. Many localities have paid attention to planting different kinds of trees. They pay attention to planting trees that last for generations and can stand dry weather such as pine and cypress. They pay even more attention to planting various trees that grow fast and have economic value so that the peasants will soon be benefited. All the 48 households of the third production team, Dongjingyang production brigade, Linyi County, have moved into new houses. The average floor space of each household is 106.4 square meters. Half of the wood needed for building the houses was taken from old houses and the other half was from fast-growing poplar trees planted around houses, villages, by the roadside and around water. Hawthorns have been planted in great numbers in Chenyu Commune Jiangxian County. Last year, the average income per capita from selling fruit and saplings of Hawthorn alone amounted to 55 yuan. The average income per capita of Chencunyu production brigade of this commune was 254 yuan. Yonghe and Shilou Counties have also been greatly benefited by planting data trees along the Huanghe River. Last year, Yonghe County's 5 communes along the Huanghe River sold 1.5 million jin of dates and the average income per capita was 61 yuan, according for 40 percent of the average total income per capita of these communes and production brigades.

I have just mainly stressed changing the production conditions. The fundamental way to solve the drought problem in our province is not only to stress changing the production conditions but also to attach importance to adapting things to the production conditions.

Our province is located in a semiarid region. With our efforts, we may ease the drought problem but it is impossible to change this natural feature of dryness within a short time. Therefore, while doing a good job in cultivating the limited area of irrigated land, we must adapt things to dry weather and popularize with great efforts typical examples of cultivating nonirrigated farmland. We must strengthen scientific study on crops that can resist dry weather and can grow in poor soil.

The drought problem is not only the main obstacle in developing agriculture in the Xishan area and on the plains in southern Shanxi but is also the main obstacle in developing agriculture in most parts of the province. The policy of placing the soil problem in the most important position and tackling problems of soil, water and forestry in a comprehensive way is not only applicable to the Xishan area and the plains in southern Shanxi but is also applicable to most parts of the province. Of course, the natural conditions in different places vary greatly. In placing the soil problem in the most important position and tackling problems of soil, water and forestry in a comprehensive way, we must proceed from actual local conditions, adapt measures to these conditions and work out feasible plans with particular emphasis on, and in light of, the orientation of the development of production. The plains in southern Shanxi, for example, are chief cotton-producing areas in our province. However, because of dryness, per unit area yield there is rather low. In order to increase per unit area yield and to provide more commodity grain and cotton, we must make great efforts to level the irrigated land, prevent leakage in channels and ditches and strive to increase the utilization ratio of water. In regard to nonirrigated land, we must make an effort to plow deep and rake the soil in order to store up moisture in the soil and to store up autumn rain for spring use. In addition to this, we may also construct pumping stations for irrigation in places along the Huanghe River since it is convenient to pump water there. In this region, we mainly plant trees around houses, villages, by the roadside and around water. In the Xishan area, water sources are even less. We must stress turning the land into "sponge fields" and developing pastural slopes with great efforts.

We must gradually extend the wooded area on barren hills, improve vegetation, do a good job in water and soil conservation, strive to be self-sufficient and have a surplus in grain, and supply to the state more animal products and dry and fresh fruits and nuts. In implementing this policy, prefectures like Yanbei Prefecture must work out their concrete measures according to the characteristics of respective localities such as dryness, sand blown by the wind, frost and saline-alkali soil.

A large region should have a plan for tackling the drought problem and for developing production. A county, a commune or a production brigade should also have its own plan. The basis for making out plans is to go deep into reality, carry out investigations and clarify the situation. We must study history as well as the existing situation. After grasping a lot of firsthand material, we must make various comparisons and comprehensive analyses. Local people have been living for generations there and they have rich practical experiences. We must discuss with the masses and ask them for advice.

If the policy for solving the drought problem is clear and if the plans for implementation are relatively in conformity with reality, we must set about the work in earnest. If we persist in doing so for 3, 5, 10 or 20 years, we are bound to make great achievements. Last year, calculated on the area sown in our province, the average per mu yield of grain was only about 250 jin. In the future, we must further seriously implement the party's rural economic policies and put the study and popularization of agricultural science and technology in an important position. We must combine the fruits of modern scientific and technological research with our country's fine tradition of intensive and meticulous farming. The broad masses of scientific and technological workers, peasants and cadres at various levels must make joint efforts in studying and summing up a set of concrete measures and production technology which are suited to dry weather and can ensure steady and high yields. Only in this way can we have our feet firmly planted in the present and keep the future in view. We will then not be defeated by drought. These are 52 million mu of land for growing grain in our provice. If we persist in implementing the policy of placing the soil problem in the most important position and tackling problems of soil, water and forestry in a comprehensive way, and really meet the above requirements, it is not impossible to produce in each mu of irrigated land an average of 800 jin and in each mu of nonirrigated land an average of 300 jin. There will also be a great development of diversification. We are also confident that we can improve the ecological environment, bring about a fundamental change in our province's agricultural production conditions, gradually bring drought under control, ensure steady and high yields and realize a garden-style cultivation of farmland.

Issues Circular

[Report: "Provincial CPC Committee Issues Circular to Party Committees at all Levels on Seriously Implementing Comrade Huo Shilian's Views on Solving the Province's Drought Problem"]

[Text] On 2 August, the Shanxi Provincial CPC Committee issued a circular to party committees at all levels on seriously implementing Comrade Huo Shilian's views on solving the province's drought problem. The circular says:

As far as natural conditions are concerned, there are droughts in our province in 9 years out of 10. Droughts are the main obstacles preventing us from having steady and high yields in agricultural production.

In order to solve this important problem of overcoming droughts, gradually raise our ability in fighting against droughts and ensure a steady development of our province's agriculture, Comrade Huo Shilian went to over 20 counties in the Xishan area and in the plains in southern Shanxi to carry out investigations in April and May. He wrote an article entitled "The Fundamental Way To Solve Shanxi's Drought Problem" and extensively solicited opinions from the Standing Committee of the Shanxi Provincial CCP Committee, secretaries of various prefectural CPC committees and municipal CPC committees and leading comrades, specialists and technicians of agricultural departments directly under the provincial CPC committee. This article keeps the natural conditions of our province in view, sums up years of experiences in water conservation work for farmland in a relatively systematic way and puts forth the policy of keeping the future in view, setting about our work from the present situation, putting the problem of soil in the most important position and tackling the problems of soil, water and forestry in a comprehensive way. It also puts forth views on concrete measures. The provincial CPC committee holds that the article conforms with the actual conditions of our province and is workable. CPC committees at all levels must make overall plans in light of conditions in respective localities and work out concrete implementation measures. The provincial CPC committee firmly believes that if the CPC committees at all levels are clear about the guiding ideology, have the same understanding, have full faith in the masses, rely on them, and trust them, and if they work earnestly and grasp the work in this respect seriously, the drought problem in our province will certainly be properly solved in 10-20 years' time and the agricultural production of our province will certainly take on an entirely new look.

ZHONGGUO XINWEN SHE ARTICLE ON KUOMINTANG

[Special article by Zhu Zhi [2612 3589]:"A Critical Juncture for the Kuomintang's Prosperity and Survival"]

[Text] Whether in the past or at present, a political party or an individual that follows the trends of the times and the will of the people and satisfies the desire of the people will prosper. Otherwise, it will perish. Whether a party or an individual prospers or perishes depends on whether it or he has the insight to understand and the courage to follow the trends of the times. The Kuomintang (KMT), which was driven into a narrow corner, is at a critical juncture regarding its prosperity and survival. It must be careful in acquiring a clear understanding of the situation.

Dr Sun Yat-sen performed glorious deeds in our history in founding the KMT and undergoing many difficulties in overthrowing the monarchy and establishing the republic.

After the 1911 revolution, some people upheld the idea that "when the revolutionary army succeeds, the revolutionary party should dissolve." As a result, a large number of officials, politicians and speculators sneaked into the KMT and caused the KMT to lose its revolutionary spirit, become lax in organization and degenerate into an organization for a handful of people to seek official positions and wealth. This caused the struggle against Yuan Shikai and in defense of the Constitution and other struggles to suffer successive failures. Dr Sun Yat-sen deserved to be called a great revolutionary forerunner. After the CPC was founded, he had the insight and courage of a revolutionary to welcome the assistance to China of the international revolutionary force and the cooperation of the CPC. Thus began the greatest change in his life. He personally formulated the three great policies of uniting with Russia, uniting with the CPC and helping the peasants and workers; reorganized the KMT; gave a new explanation of the three people's principles; and thus laid the political foundation for the first CPC-KMT cooperation. At that time, the members of the KMT and the members of the CPC closely cooperated and fought shoulder to shoulder against the imperialists and the warlords. Through the joint efforts of the two parties, the eastern expedition was completed in a very short time and the Guangdong revolutionary base was consolidated. Moreover, through the joint efforts of the two parties, the revolutionary armed force was built up and the war of the northern expedition was won. Thus, the KMT became the political power that ruled over the whole country. When these things of the past are mentioned, some old comrades of the KMT, whose memories about these things are so fresh, cannot help but sigh with emotion.

Most unfortunately, in the middle of the triumphant progress of the northern expeditionary war, some people in power within the KMT perfidiously launched the "12 April" incident, sabotaging the cooperation between the KMT and the CPC, which Dr Sun personally created, discarding the flag of the three people's principles and starting a 10-year civil war. Japanese imperialism took the opportunity to attack, and with a powerful neighbor pressing on the border, our territory was occupied. The national crisis was unprecedentedly serious. Due to the efforts of the CPC and the patriots within the KMT, the Xian incident was peacefully resolved, the establishment of the national united front against Japan was promoted, the second cooperation between the KMT and the CPC began, the national war of resistance against Japan was carried out and an excellent situation of unity of the whole people and of the war of resistance with concerted efforts emerged. After the arduous struggle of the whole country, the victory in the 8-year war of resistance was eventually achieved.

After the victory of the anti-Japanese war, an excellent situation, which was favorable for rehabilitating the country in a peaceful environment, emerged in our country. At that time Mao Zedong, chairman of the CPC, went to Chongqing to hold negotiations with the KMT at the invitation of Chiang Kai-shek, president of the KMT. After deliberations lasting 40-odd days, the representatives of both sides reached an agreement and signed the minutes of the talks. The KMT declared that it agreed to the basic principles of the scheme for peacefully rehabilitating the nation, recognized the equal legal status of other parties and factions and certain democratic rights of the people, and promised to convene a political consultative meeting. However, it refused to recognize the people's government in the liberated zones under the leadership of the CPC. The people were content with the results of the negotiations between the KMT and the CPC and hoped to see the implementation of the agreement. However, with the support of foreign forces, the KMT tore up the agreement soon afterward and imposed another civil war on the people. The CPC was then forced to rise in resistance, leading the people -- including those patriotic democratic elements within the KMT -- throughout the country to carry out the 3-year-long liberation war. The 8 million-strong troops, supported by the United States, were eventually defeated and, subsequently, the KMT was forced to retreat from the mainland.

In early 1949, some intelligent people in the KMT were again busily running about for KMT-CPC peaceful negotiations. It is for this purpose that Mr Zhang Wenbo went to Xikou on four occasions, and each time he was greeted and seen off by Mr Chiang Ching-Kuo, who once told Mr Wenbo in a car that "relying on the natural moat of the Yangtse River and the remaining 1-million-strong army, it is possible to prevent the PLA from crossing the Yangtse River." How confident Chiang Ching-kuo was when he said this. Nevertheless, before long, he was driven out to stay in a small corner of Taiwan. History is ruthless. One can gain knowledge and strength if he treats the historical lessons correctly.

The KMT has been in Taiwan for 33 years. In the beginning, they prated about "waging a counterattack against the mainland," but now they are glibly talking about "achieving the reunification of China with the three people's principles." This kind of gross deception is incapable of leading to a solution for the difficulties that the KMT faces at present, nor will it be able to win the sympathy and understanding of the Taiwanese people and the overseas Chinese compatriots. Over the past 3 years or more, the CPC has valued the righteous cause of the nation above everything else, forgiven the old wrongs and relinquished past grudges and put forth the suggestion of holding talks between both parties, achieving the third cooperation and striving together for strengthening China. However, the KMT authorities in Taiwan called all this "a united front plot," saying that they are just "sweet words and insinuating manners which are as poisonous as snakes and scorpions." Recently, they even went as far as claiming that "we refuse to hold talks with it or to have any contact with it so that its plot will never succeed." Such words should never have been said.

Peaceful reunification and making China strong and prosperous were the behests of numerous revolutionary martyrs and the common desire of the Chinese nation. One of the achievements of Dr Sun Yat-sen was to initiate the first KMT-CPC cooperation. An unforgettable thing which Chiang Kai-shek did was to realize the second KMT-CPC cooperation. At present, the historical task of the third KMT-CPC cooperation has been entrusted to Mr Chiang Ching-kuo. A politician and a political party will go down in history if they can keep abreast of the times and situation and in accord with popular feelings. If the KMT led Mr Chiang Ching-kuo can resolutely attend peace talks to accomplish the task of the reunification of the motherland, the KMT and CPC will coexist for a long time and supervise each other.

The KMT will continue to play its due role on the Chinese political stage. Mr Sun said long ago that the three people's principles and communism are good friends. As long as both sides refrain from imposing their views on each other, both Taiwan and the mainland can develop peacefully and carry out peaceful competition. Why should Mr Chiang not do such a thing which is beneficial to the country, people and the Chiang family?

ALUMNI GROUP RAPS U.S. ARMS SALES TO TAIWAN

[Text] Beijing, 11 Aug (XINHUA) -- The Taiwan Alumni Association [tai wan tong xue hui 0669 3494 068] 1331 2585] recently held its first annual meeting at Beidaihe to discuss the work report of its council and draw up a work plan for the next year. Lin Shengzhong [2651 4141 0022], president of the Taiwan Alumni Association, reported on the work of the council to the meeting. He said, since its inauguration in Beijing last November, the Taiwan Alumni Association has frequently held discussion meetings on the problems Taiwan alumni who have returned from overseas to work in the motherland have in regard to their work and daily life and then informed the departments concerned to help them find good solutions to such problems. It has also sponsored tea parties, spring outings, summer camps and other activities to promote understanding and friendship among members of the association; it has held receptions for Taiwan compatriots who have returned from overseas to visit relatives or are on tours and briefed them on the mainland situation of the motherland, actively taking part in the propaganda work aimed at Taiwan, and offered opinions and proposals on the reunification of the motherland and the four modernizations. He said that in 1983 the Taiwan Alumni Association will continue to act as the bridge between Taiwan alumni at home and abroad and will further strengthen its contacts with them. It also plans to join other units in cosponsoring summer camp activities for young Taiwan compatriots from overseas, invite Taiwan alumni from abroad to attend discussion meetings on the peaceful reunification of China and make suggestions on the reunification of the motherland and the four modernizations.

The meeting adopted a resolution expressing its indignation at the U.S. Government which intends to continue its arms sales to Taiwan. The resolution noted that despite the establishment of diplomatic relations between China and the United States, there are still some people in the United States who attempt to separate Taiwan from the motherland. The U.S. Government, openly violating the Shanghai Communique, the communique on the establishment of diplomatic relations between China and the United States and the norms of international law, has concocted the so-called "Taiwan Relations Act" and intends to continuously sell weapons to Taiwan. This not only obstructs China's peaceful reunification but also seriously interferes with China's internal affairs and encroaches upon the sovereignty of China. We express our indignation at such acts of hegemonism on the part of the U.S. Government and denounce it.

The meeting also expressed sincere hopes that the teachers and alumni in Taiwan and overseas will return to the motherland for tours, observation trips, visits and lectures and offer their advice and suggestions and make contributions for the reunification of the motherland and the prosperity of the Chinese nation. It also wished that they may find time to pay a return visit to their alma maters and call on their teachers and alumni so as to enhance friendly feelings for each other. The meeting elected Zhao Fen [6392 5358] (female) an additional council member of the Taiwan Alumni Association.

MADAME CHIANG SENDS OPEN LETTER TO LIAO CHENGZHI

[Text] Taipei, Aug. 18 (CNA) -- Madame Chiang Kai-shek Tuesday called on Liao Cheng-chih, "vice chairman" of the Standing Committee of National People's Congress of Red China, to follow the will of his late father Liao Chung-kai, a senior member of the Kuomintang, so that we can have the opportunity of joining the national reconstruction work of the Republic of China and enjoying some good days in his old years.

In an open letter to Liao, Madame Chiang stressed that as President Chiang Ching-kuo shoulders the responsibility of accomplishing the national cause, his firm stand of "no contact, no negotiation, and no compromise with the Peiping regime" fully reflects the justice and righteousness of the KMT, Chinese people and the Republic of China. Madame Chiang related her aquaintance with Liao's parents in Canton about 57 years ago. She especially expressed admiration for Liao's mother, who, an old fashioned Chinese woman without receiving Western education, could not only speak eloquently on Dr. Sun Yat-sen's three principles of the people, but also understand the meaning of Western democracy. Madame Chiang also mentioned the fact that after careful consideration, Dr Sun appointed Liao's father as the KMT's representative in Whampoa Military Academy which was headed by the late President Chiang Kai-shek.

She reminded Liao that in his speech to the military students on the eve before he launched the northern expedition, the late President Chiang had highly praised Liao's father for his contributions of the KMT. "Your father was a faithful disciple of Dr. Sun, and you should follow his will by practicing both patriotism and filial piety so that you will not damage your father's good reputation and historical record."

During the time of so-called cultural revolution, Madame Chiang noted, "you were one of those who suffered severely in the power struggle and who luckily escaped death from the mouth of the tiger." According to statistics, from 1966 to 1976 more than 20 million people died with another 600 million Chinese suffering from misery and infliction of the mainland. "Even such Chinese Communist Party leaders as Liu Shao-chi, Peng Teh-huai and Ho Lung were starved to death," Madame Chiang pointed out. The TIME magazine had also reported that the Peiping regime killed some 50 million people since its occupation of mainland China in 1949. "This is a record in comparison with even the most ruthless and totalitarian killers in the world history."

Madame Chiang then emphasized that since its establishment, the Republic of China had always abided by the spirit of patriotism and the three principles of the people as created by Dr. Sun. But the Chinese Communist have followed the alien ideology of Marxism-Leninism as their dogma, Madame Chiang said.

She paid respects to Dr. Sun's wisdom and farsightedness in advocating the policy of joining hands with those people of the world who would treat the Chinese people as their equal. "Dr. Sun advocated cooperation with either the Soviet Union or Japan according to the needs and circumstances of the nation and for the benefit of the Chinese people," Madame Chiang said.

Madame Chiang said that Liao's suggestion for the so-called third cooperation between the Republic of China and the Chinese Communists is nothing but a day dream. She asked Liao not to forget the continuing power struggle, severe punishment and torture, and downgrading of the human dignity during the rule of Mao Tze-tung.

Even now, Madame Chiang said, rampant corruption and bribery are scourging the mainland with some people of special privileges going around the back doors and struggling to obtain benefits for themselves through nepotism. "A clever man like you, how can you be continued to be used by the evil Chinese Communists for the rest of your life?" Madame Chiang asked.

CHINA POST NOTES SUPPORT OF U.S. CONGRESS

[Text] The continuous support for the Republic of China conveyed by 15 U.S. congressional leaders to Republic of China's delegation of legislators shows the continuous staunch support the Republic of China has on Capitol Hill.

The group of influential congressional leaders, consisting of two senators and 13 congressmen, expressed their support for the full implementation of the Taiwan Relations Act. The group includes Senator Barry Goldwater, Re -Arizona, chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee and Senator Charles Percy, chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. The 13 congressmen are Edward Derwinski, Rep-Illinois, Jack Kemp, Rep-N.Y., Bob Daniel, Rep-Virginia, Samuel Stratton, Dem-N.Y., Gerald Solomon, Rep-N.Y., Eldo Rudd, Rep-Arizona, John Meyer, Rep-Indiana, Robert Livingston, Rep-La, Marjorie Holt, Rep-Maryland, Mickey Edwards, Rep.- Oklahoma, Daniel Crane, Rep.-Illinois, Philip Crane, Rep.-Illinois and Mario Biaggi, Dem.-N.Y.

They told the ROC legislators, led by Liu Juo-tsai, vice president of the Legislative Juan, that they fully support the Taiwan Relations Act and oppose any Washington-Peiping joint communique on U.S. arms sales to the Republic of China.

It seems that Peiping is still applying great pressure on the Reagan administration to issue a joint communique similar to th Shanghai Communique on the Republic of China arms sales issue. Although there are people in the State Department favoring such a communique, they have not succeeded in getting the approval of either Secretary of State George Shultz or President Ronald Reagan who is still holding to his promise that he will not betray the people of the Republic of China and will fulfill the Taiwan Relations Act.

As President Reagan is a man of principle and vision, he realizes only too well the dire consequences of succumbing to Chinese Communist blackmail. The U.S. would lose the confidence and trust of all Asian allies and friends an the Asian and Pacific region would panic if the Republic of China should be deprived of arms sales in violation of the Taiwan Relations Act. This would also mean the violation of the Taiwan Relations Act by President Reagan himself, who has the sworn duty of upholding the law of the land.

We would like to remind President Reagan that to succumb to Chinese Communist blackmail on the arms sales issue would greatly hurt his popularity rating and his chance of re-election bid largely as a result of his China policy mistakes. We hope that Mr. Reagan will not follow in his footsteps, and make the same mistakes again.

PAPER SAYS REAGAN DISTORTS SINO-U.S. COMMUNIQUE

["New Talk" column: "Respect History and Take Reality Into Consideration"]

[Text] The Chinese and U.S. Governments issued a joint communique and have reached agreement on a gradual and final solution to the problem of U.S. arms sales to Taiwan.

This was the so-called "Shanghai communique No 2" which people talked about before. However, the communique was simultaneously issued yesterday in Beijing and Washington and had nothing to do with Shanghai. The communique follows the practice of seeking common ground while reserving differences. In order words, identical views are included whereas differences between both sides are also reserved. This follows the method of the "Shanghai Communique" issued 10 years ago.

In the new joint communique, the United States has promised that its arms sales to Taiwan will not exceed, either in qualitative or in quantitative terms, the level of those supplied in recent years since the establishment of diplomatic relations between the United States and China, and that it intends gradually to reduce its sale of arms to Taiwan, leading, over a period of time, to a final resolution. Therefore, this is regarded as a beginning to the solution of the problem. Taiwan's CENTRAL NEWS AGENCY said that the United States had revised its policy of arms sales to Taiwan and a U.S. TV station pointed out that Reagan had overturned his previous policy. However, Reagan rejected the criticisms and telephoned the TV station to lodge his protest.

The United States tried to link the matter of halting arms supplies to Taiwan with China's abandonment of its efforts to resort to force in order to unify Taiwan. Sino-U.S. negotiations held over the past 10 months nearly reached an impasse because of this problem. In the third point of the communique, the Chinese Government reiterates that the Taiwan problem is China's internal affair. It also stressed that reunifying the motherland through peaceful means is an important guiding principle of the Chinese Government. The whole world has long since been aware of this guiding principle which has been coordinated into a series of activities and supported and welcomed by Chinese inside and outside China. China did not formulate this guiding principle in order to please the United States.

The Chinese Foreign Ministry issued a statement yesterday, saying that the purpose of mentioning peaceful reunification of the motherland in the communique is to further express China's sincerity for the peaceful settlement of the Taiwan problem. Since this is purely China's internal affair, no distortions or foreign intervention can be tolerated. A RENMIN RIBAO editorial pointed out, with regard to this matter, that the United States has no right to ask China to carry out any commitments and regard China's efforts to solve the Taiwan problem through peaceful means as a prerequisite for halting arms supplies to Taiwan.

According to the norms governing international relations, since the United States acknowledges that the Beijing government is the sole legal government of China, it should stop selling weapons to Taiwan immediately. In view of the fact that this is a historical problem, the Chinese Government believes that it should be handled in the same way as other historical problems. In other words, it should be solved step by step in light of practical conditions. However, it should eventually be solved. Since the United States has promised that it intends gradually to reduce its sale of arms to Taiwan, leading to a complete stop of arms sales, China is allowing the United States to continue to sell weapons to Taiwan for a certain period of time.

Notwithstanding, this does not mean that it is the right and commitment of the United States to sell weapons to Taiwan.

Due to agreements reached in the joint communique, the crisis of retrogression of Sino-U.S. relations has been eased. If the United States can conscientiously implement the stipulations concerned which are contained in the communique and stop selling weapons to Taiwan as early as possible, Sino-U.S. relations will make progress. However, Reagan issued a statement yesterday which distorted the joint communique. He said that the United States would continue to pursue the "Taiwan Relations Act" and hoped that the Chinese Government would settle the Taiwan problem through peaceful means. He also stressed that the United States would continue to sell weapons to Taiwan. It is obvious that Sino-U.S. relations will neither markedly deteriorate nor tremendously improve even after the publication of the joint communique.

SINO-U.S. RELAXATION SEEN AS 'TEMPORARY'

[Editorial: "A Temporary Relaxation in Sino-U.S. Relations"]

[Text] The joint communique released at the same time by Beijing and Washington yesterday announced the conclusion of an agreement on the phasing out of U.S. arms sales to Taiwan, leading to a final solution of the issue.

The working out of this communique, its contents and the procedure concerning its distribution are marked with distinct features.

As far as the time factor is concerned, talks on Sino-U.S. relations lasted for 10 months. During that time, U.S. Vice President Bush specially came to China to exchange opinions and also brought with him three letters from U.S. President Reagan. It can be seen that many complications marked the talks.

As far as procedure is concerned, apart from the joint communique, both sides have separately issued a statement. China's statement was released by a spokesman for the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. The United States statement was personally read on television by Reagan. There is quite a wide area of conflict, as far as certain contents of these two statements are concerned.

It can be said that one joint communique and two statements have actually been issued to describe the existing state of Sino-U.S. relations. After 10 months of talks, both sides at last found areas of agreement on the problem of U.S. arms sales to Taiwan, breaking a long deadlock. But on the other hand, there are still many questions about whether there can be continuous development in the relations between the two countries.

For a time, China issued many warnings that if the U.S. authorities insisted on violating the Shanghai Communique and the communique on the establishment of diplomatic relations between China and the United States, which would be following a perverted course, then there would be a retrogression in the relations between the two countries. Now, with the release of the new joint communique, the situation of retrogression has been temporarily avoided. There is respite from a possible crisis. But the main problem affecting the relations between the two countries stillexists. Therefore, the dark clouds have not all been removed.

Everyone knows that a main problem affecting Sino-U.S. relations is the "Taiwan Relations Act" concocted by the U.S. side after the establishment of diplomatic relations between the two countries. It has treated Taiwan as an independent political entity and has insisted on continuously selling arms to Taiwan. This is an act of openly encroaching upon China's sovereignty and interfering in China's internal affairs. This has of course met with the resolute opposition of the Chinese Government and people. Since this is a problem bearing on a country's sovereignty, there can never be an unprincipled concession.

At the recent meeting, the U.S. side made repeated statements about respecting China's sovereignty and territorial integrity and nonintervention in China's internal affairs. This held out the possibility of an initial solution to the problem of U.S. arms sales to Taiwan. Since China respects principle and at the same time takes historical factors into consideration. It agreed to the gradual reduction of arms sales to Taiwan by the United States made three pledges: 1) The quantity and quality of arms sold shall not exceed the supply levels of the past few years; 2) To make gradual reductions; 3) To seek a final solution to this problem after a period of time. Now, the problem is whether the United States will actually translate its pledges into reality and finally and completely stop the sale of arms to Taiwan.

A contradiction revealed by the U.S. administration itself is that on the one hand, it has said that it "understands and appreciates" China's policy of working for a peaceful solution to the Taiwan problem. On the other hand, it has clung to the "Taiwan Relations Act" without letting go, obstructing China's effort to seek a peaceful solution to the Taiwan problem. In the statement released yesterday, Reagan again stressed that the policy expressed by the U.S. side in the Sino-U.S. joint communique was "entirely in line with the 'Taiwan Relations Act.'" This fully shows that the U.S. authorities will likely continue to use two-faced tactics in Sino-U.S. relations in the future.

On this matter, the RENMIN RIBAO editorial pointed out what the spokesman for the PRC Ministry of Foreign Affairs did not spell out: "If Washington's policymakers insist on handling the relations between the two countries on the basis of this law of the country, then Sino-U.S. relations will not only cease to develop but will inevitably face another serious crisis." This is a new warning.

The Sino-U.S. relations that have developed to the current state have only reached the medium stage. Whether there will be continuous progress, or whether there will be another crisis of retrogression -- this depends on whether the United States will really act on its words.

In the Sino-U.S. relations, China has displayed principled flexibility, or flexibility based on principle. There can never be a concession on the problem of sovereignty. In its concrete approach, China has taken historical factors into consideration and has proceeded from realities. This move calls for the particular attention of those who are studying China's foreign policy and the way it handles other problems.

WEN WEI PO: SINO-U.S. COMMUNIQUE PRC 'VICTORY'

[Editorial: "Victory for the Chinese People's Diplomacy -- Commenting on the Sino-U.S. 'Joint Communique'"]

[Text] The tension in Sino-U.S. relations caused by the question of U.S. arms sales to Taiwan has now been finally eased by the publication of the "Sino-U.S. communique." The Chinese people have won another victory in the diplomatic struggle to defend state sovereignty.

The reiteration of the principles is extremely important. Since the United States "recognizes the Chinese People's Republic as the sole legitimate government of China and also acknowledges the Chinese position that there is but one China and Taiwan is a part of China," and since it affirms that "mutual respect for the sovereignty and territorial integrity and noninterference in each other's internal affairs constitute the fundamental principles guiding Sino-U.S. relations," then all arms sales, official contacts and escalation of agencies will violate the principles reiterated above and lose whatever legal basis they possess.

Regardless of how many differences there still are between the actual conditions and these principles, the confirming of these principles as a guidance for Sino-U.S. relations is beyond doubt a great victory in China's diplomatic struggle. This is another example that China will never barter away its principles.

The issue obstructing Sino-U.S. relations is U.S. arms sales to Taiwan. Obviously, this is crude interference in China's internal affairs by the United States. Therefore, China has lodged a strong protest and has also carried out long negotiations with the United States. Did the United States not want China to make a peaceful undertaking regarding Taiwan as a precondition for halting arms sales to Taiwan? If the U.S. demand is accepted, China will no doubt be giving up her integrity and sovereignty and yielding to power policies. China may take into consideration the historical relations between the United States and Taiwan and make appropriate concessions, but never at the expense of her sovereignty. After clearly reiterating that "the question of Taiwan is China's internal affair" in the just published "joint communique," the United States expressed that it has "no intention of interfering in China's internal affairs" and stated that it "does not seek to carry out a long-term policy of arms sales to Taiwan." Its main points are: 1) arms sales "will not exceed the level of those supplied in recent years since the establishment of diplomatic relations between the United States and China." 2) "Sales of arms to Taiwan" will be "gradually reduced." 3) This will lead "over a period of time, to a final resolution." China has not made any commitment regarding this "final resolution." Since it has maintained that the return of Taiwan is China's internal affair, how can it allow itself to be ordered about by others or be tied down? Judging from this, the resolution of the question of arms sales to Taiwan will develop along the principle of "noninterference in internal affairs" and its orientation will be conducive to China. It is another important Chinese victory in this diplomatic struggle.

The group of impenetrably thickheaded gentlemen in the "U.S. committee for a free Asia" will lament that the new policy statement will frustrate Taiwan and infuriate many of Reagan's conservative supporters. It appears to have also explained on the other hand the essence and trend of the "joint communique."

We have long warned the Taiwan authorities that to be slavishly dependent on other people in order to gain a brief respite is not a permanent solution for Taiwan. For the sake of the great undertaking of national unification and their own future, they should abandon their former resentment and return to the motherland. Ye Jianying's proposal and Liao Chengzhi's letter have already explained the righteousness of the cause and have expressed their sincerity. Now that the "joint communique" has again clearly explained the historical trend, how can you gentlemen in Taiwan shut your eyes, stop up your ears and not give careful consideration to the matter!

As for the conservative gentlemen of America, they may become infuriated, strike the table, rise to their feet, yell and try to start something again. However, China has long ago informed these diehards that China needs no help from America. China has experienced military harassment and threats from the superpowers and has also been through a long period of economic blockade. However, China has not been affected in any way but has continued to forge ahead. China will never shamefacedly barter away its sovereignty. Now that China is back on the road of healthy construction, it is possible that it will submit to external pressure? Friendship between the Chinese and American people is an inevitable trend of history which these diehards have no means of changing. Naturally, the agreement reached in the communique still depends on the test of U.S. sincerity in practice. However, there is no going against the law of historical development. The reiteration of the principles of the communique for establishing diplomatic relations by the U.S. administration is another proof of this point.

MING PAO ON LIBERALIZATION TRENDS IN PRC

HK171118 Hong Kong MING PAO in Chinese 17 Aug 82 P 5

[Special dispatch from Beijing: "CPC Opposes Liberalization]

The departments concerned pointed out that the liberalization trends inside the party are primarilly manifested in two areas:

First, liberalization trends are found among certain party members and party cadres. For instance, regarding the line, principles and policies formulated by the CPC Central Committee, some of these people adopt a very casual attitude and implement only the policies which are to their liking, and some even go their own way. Some others wantonly write articles or give speeches which are out of tune with the four basic principles and the spirit of the CPC Central Committee. Some people violate the party's organizational principle and form small gangs. Some turn a blind eye to party discipline in assigning work posts and resolutely disregard the assignments of party organizations. Some ignore party regulations and the "guiding principles," do not take the advice of the party organizations and continue the practice of claiming kinship, doing things through the back door and promoting unsavory trends.

Second, liberalization trends can also be found in certain party organizations and among the responsible comrades concerned, who fail to deal severely with the erroneous words, deeds and actions in violation of the law and discipline of party members and, particularly, party cadres. They have not taken appropriate actions to educate or deal with these people but have even harbored some of them.

The departments concerned held that the liberalization trends currently found inside are, on the one hand, a passive reflection of the extreme sturggles promoted under the past ultraleftist guiding ideology and, on the other, are a result of the 10 years of upheaval during which there was no government control, no organization and no discipline. These party members and party cadres are "placing personal interests on the primary level and revolutionary interests on the secondary level." Thus, the fundamental method to overcome the liberalization trends is to enhance the communist ideological awareness and overcome the various forms of individualism, mainly by means of rectifying party work style.

In order to overcome the liberalization trends, the Organization Department of the CPC Central Committee has approved and transmitted the "Circular on Several Regulations and Discipline Concerning the Appointment and Dismissal and Transferring of Cadres" which had been jointly issued by the Discipline Inspection Committee and Organizational Department of the Shanxi Provincial CPC Committee, and has demanded that each cadre and, in particular, the party cadres spontaneously obey the assignments and postings of the party organizations. One stipulation was that cadres who have received a posting should report for duty on the due date; necessary disciplinary action will be taken against those who disobey the posting.

The Organization Department of the CPC Central Committee stressed that it is necessary to resolutely put an end to the liberalization trends concerning the posting of cadres. Currently, the phenomenon of not submitting to the party organizations' decisions and persisting in placing personal interests on the primary level is still found in some places. Such unsavory trends not only sabotage organizational discipline, corrupt the atmosphere of the organizations and weaken the party's combat effectiveness, but also hinder the party organizations's efforts, in accordance with the demands for socialist modernization, im promptly readjusting the leadership groups and carrying out cadre posting.

Thus, first of all, we must boldly and assuredly stress discipline; second, we must formulate clear-cut regulations; and third, we must impartially and incorruptibly put an end to all unsavory trends.

I

[Text] Since the beginning of the 1980's, the rate of increase in the volume of world trade has continued to drop, and in 1981, the rate of increase was zero. This was the third time that a zero increase in world trade emerged during the more than 30 years since the world war. The previous two instances of zero increase emerged in the late 1950's and during the first half of the 1970's when there were economic crises in the capitalist world and world trade was decreasing. What the zero increase in world trade and the two previous instances of zero increase differ in is that the zero increase this time is much more serious than the previous two. Because of the serious recession of the economies of the industrially developed Western countries, it is very difficult for a quick reovery of or increase in world trade.

The major factors that have an impact on world trade are: 1) While domestic demand is growing very slowly in the industrially developed Western countries that are sunk deep in the predicament of "stagflation," the trade conditions are worsening, the burden of debts is aggravating and the import capacity is falling in the developing countries. 2) The unprecedentedly high interest rates have curtailed economic and commercial activities. 3) The exchange rates in the world money market are fiercely fluctuating and this has impeded trade activities. 4) The growing tendency of protectionism in the industrially developed countries has been especially unfavorable for the developing countries in expanding their exports.

Under these conditions, it is impossible for world trade to develop quickly and vigorously. As the above-mentioned unfavorable conditions for developing trade will not be substantially improved in the near future, it is estimated that world trade volume will increase slowly in the coming few years.

Under the present economic situation, the market problem has become of increasingly greater concern for all countries. The Western industrialized countries are paying increasingly closser attention to extricating themselves from their domestic economic predicaments through development of external trade. For this, they are carrying out readjustment of their industrial structure and striving to make their goods more competitive. Meanwhile, the developing countries also need to develop the economies of their countries through developing external trade as sell as conducting the struggle to change the old world economic order.

The development of the world economy today has already made the economies of various countries increasingly closely related with one another and made them rely increasingly more on another and have an increasingly greater influence on one another. The proportion of U.S. exports to the Third World in total U.S. exports climbed from 29.6 percent in 1970 to 37.9 percent in 1980. The EEC exports nearly half of its goods to the Third World. It can be foreseen that during the 1980's the market in the developing countries will become increasingly important and the United States and other Western countries will find it very difficult to maintain their economies if they are deprived of the broad market in the Third World and the supplies of raw materials and energy from the Third World.

Reforming the old order in the world economy and establishing a new world economic order in accordance with the principle of equality and mutual benefits has already become the trend of the times. This will be favorable not only for promoting the economic development of the developing countries, but also for the prosperity of economy of the whole world, including the developed countries.

In the future world market, the manufactured goods trade will continue to occupy an important position. The industrial structure of the Western developed countries will continue to develop into a structure with industries that need intense investment, intense technological application and intense employment of intellectuals which will enable these countries to increase the value of their products. These countries will also continue to develop the industries which conserve energy and resources. On the other hand, most of the developing countries will continue to primarily develop the industries that use intense labor, although a small number of countries and areas that have been developing at a greater speed will begin to shift too developing the industries that need intense investment and intense technological application. In the course of this development the technology trade will quickly develop, though the trade of resources will, of course, still be important. In order to promote this kind of crosswise international cooperation, and in the industrially developed countries' own interests, it is necessary for these countries to gradually reduce their restrictions on their imports of manufactured goods from the developing countries so as to promote the development of the developing countries' industry and expand their market. Protectionism will not make the goods produced by the industrialized countries more competitive nor promote the rational international division of labor, which will enable both the developed and the developing countries to give play to their strong points and avoid their weak points and thus benefit one another.

II

China is one of the developing countries and it is striving to realize the modernization of its industry, agriculture, national defense, science and technology. Our country's basic principle in building socialism is "independence and self-reliance." This principle is determined by the nature of our state. Ours is a country with a huge population, abundant resources and a vast domestic market. In such a country, in the process of building socialism according to a Marxist-Leninist line, we must rely on our own strength. However, self-reliance should never be interpreted as closing up the country to the outside world and practicing self-sufficiency. In the present world, no countries will be able to do without foreign trade and external economic and technical cooperation in the course of its modernization. Therefore, we always advocate that in developing our economy, we should utilize two kinds of resources: First the domestic resource and second the international resources; we should open up two markets: First the domestic market and second the international market; and we should learn two kinds of knowledge: First the knowledge to manage our domestic economy and second the knowledge to develop external economic exchanges and trade. Our country has rich natural resources, sufficient labor and a certain industrial foundation, and these are favorable conditions for our economic construction. However, on the other hand, our science and technology are relatively backward, our production is relatively underdeveloped and our financial resources are insufficient; these are the unfavorable conditions for our economic development. The development of foreign trade and of various forms of international cooperation is precisely a way to make use of the strong points of other countries in order to offset our weak points. This will never impede the implementation of our principle of self-reliance. On the contrary, it will increase our strength in realizing the four modernizations program. Therefore, persisting in carrying out the policy of opening to the outside world on the basis of maintaining independence and practicing self-reliance is one of the long-term strategic policies that our country will steadfastly adhere to.

At the present stage, our external trade work can be mainly summarized as follows:

1. We should give play to our strong points and increase our exports in order to achieve a relatively great development of our foreign trade.

According to our country's actual conditions and the demand in the world market, in developing our exports, we will stress the following: We should give play to our strong points in having rich natural resources and exploit and export in a planned manner some of the energy and mineral products such as coal, oil and some nonferrous metals of which we have rich deposits; we should give play to our strong point in having sufficient labor, increase the exports of the products that need intensive labor and the exports of the goods that we make from imported raw materials and the developing process of foreign goods; we should improve the quality and increase the varieties of the textile products we export and produce and export more high-class and medium-class textile products; we should make full use of the strong points in our country's natural geographical conditions, give play to our strong points of having traditional handicrafts and develop the exports of various agricultural, sideline and local special products and handicraft products; and we should tap the potential of our machine-building industry and increase the exports of our mechanical products, electrical apparatuses, and instruments.

While increasing exports, our import trade will develop accordingly. The composition of our imports should meet the needs resulting from the readjustment and development of our national economy. In the future we will import less complete sets of equipment. However, we will introduce more technology and key equipment which will be necessary in developing our national economy and conducting technical reform in our enterprises. In this regard, we have a great potential to tap and there are broad prospects for cooperation and technical exchanges with foreign countries. We will organize, in a planned manner, the raw materials that are necessary for industrial production (primarily the textile industry), other materials, and the materials and goods for agricultural production (such as fertilizer and pesticides). We will continue to organize the imports of food grain and other goods which will ease the tension of supplies in our domestic market in accordance with the changing situation related to production and the people's domestic demands.

2. We should give play to the strong points of our coastal areas and strengthen our external economic and commercial relations with the outside world.

In our coastal areas industry is relatively developed, technical force is strong and communications are convenient; therefore, these areas have long since been the linking areas for developing foreign economic relations and trade. In order to give full play to the strong points of these areas, we should increase the proportion of the exports of these areas in the total exports of our country and encourage these areas to conscientiously utilize foreign capital, to introduce appropriate advanced techniques and necessary key equipment, to strengthen international economic cooperation and technical exchanges and to develop foreign trade in diversified forms so as to have a bigger share of the world market.

We should continue to reform the structure of our foreign trade and further bring to play the initiative of all sectors.

Since 1979, we have carried out one by one some trial reform measures in out foreign trade structure and some of the power to undertake foreign trade has been transferred to local areas and enterprises and has thus expanded the local areas' and enterprises' power to undertake foreign trade and increased the circulation channels. Some of the central industrial departments and some provinces and municipalities have established a number of general export and import companies and addition to the special line import goods companies that are directly under the Ministry of Foreign Economic Relations. Moreover, we have carried out experiments on the undertaking of foreign trade directly through diversified forms of enterprises that combine production and trade and by complex enterprises.

In the future we will promote the reform of our foreign trade structure in a planned and orderly manner on the basis of summing up our past experience. The general orientation of the reform is to shift the actual undertaking of foreign trade to enterprises or complex enterpriese and expand these enterprises; power of operation, while implementing a strict economic responsibility system to unify power, responsibility and interests; and to strengthen unified leadership over our foreign trade that is to be carried out separately by various enterprises with the Ministry of Foreign Economic Relations acting as a department of the State Council to manage foreign economic relations and trade and being responsible for the task of guiding, coordinating, supervising and managing the foreign trade throughout the country in order to give play to the initiative of all and develop foreign trade under the prerequisite of implementing a unified policy, planning foreign trade and dealing with the outside world in unity.

After the economic readjustment of the past few years, our country has scored remarkable achievements in various fields and the trend of development is becoming increasingly favorable. Our agricultural and light industrial production has risen relatively sharply and at present we are speeding up the construction of our energy industries and communications undertakings. Meanwhile we will readjust, reorganize and carry out technical reform to our existing enterprises by stages and in groups. In this process, our foreign trade will continue to increase and a rate of increase higher than the rate of increase of our national economy will be maintained. It can be expected that along with the development of our construction, a more broad and sound foundation will be laid for developing our foreign trade and external economic cooperation.

III

Since new China was founded, Sino-U.S. relations were abnormal for a rather long time and the trade between the two countries ceased for more than 20 years. In February 1972, China and the United States signed the Shanghai Communique and since then the nonofficial trade relations between the two countries have been restored, the volume of trade has increased yearly and the contacts between trade personnel of the two countries have also become increasingly frequent. The establishment of formal diplomatic relations between China and the United States have created favorable conditions for the development of trade between the two countries. By 1979, the total amount of trade between the two countries rose to $2.4 billion (according to Chinese statistics), which was 140 percent more than trade in 1978 when diplomatic relations were not established. In 1980 and 1981, trade further developed and the total amount of trade was $4.64 and $5.67 billion respectively and the 1981 figure was again 140 percent more than trade in 1979. Though China and the United States established their diplomatic relations as late as 1979, the trade between the two countries has been developing very quickly and their bilateral trade has now jumped to rank third in our country's trade with foreign countries and is behind only Japan and the Hong Kong area. Our imports from the United States has jumped to rank second, behind Japan. The 100 percent increase in bilateral trade over the past 3 years since the establishment of diplomatic relations clearly shows the potential of Sino-U.S. trade.

However, there have also been unsatisfactory aspects in the development process and the major problems at present are:

1. Our deficits have been relatively big. Though reduced, the 1981 deficit was still $1.71 billion and the accumulated deficits from 1972 to 1981 reached $6.33 billion. If this state of affairs is not remedied, the quick development of trade between the two countries cannot be maintained.

2. The trade law and regulations that the United States formulated in the past are hindering even quicker development of bilateral trade.

For example, there is the problem related to the control over exports to China. Out of the consideraton of its political and economic needs, the U.S. Government has adopted a relatively flexible attitude in exercising this control and has occasionally expressed its intention to slacken it. The U.S. Government has failed to use many actions to carry out what it has expressed and up to now no remarkable change has, in essence, been brought to this control. It is said that the United States has in its hands many advanced techniques, but it has not provided many techniques to China and it is not even willing to sell the electronic computer that is for the purely civil purpose of the population census. Another example is its import restrictions on Chinese products. In September 1980, not long after the two countries signed an agreement on textile trade, the U.S. side tried to expand the scope of restriction on the import of China's textile products and asked China to discuss the setting of quotas on woolen sweaters and cardigans. In March 1981, the U.S. Government declared that it had imposed a new restriction on the import of a third class of textiles such as knitted coats from China. The United States has also intensified its import control over other so-called sensitive goods.

For all the above-mentioned problems, we have expressed our concern.

At present, as the U.S. Government disregards China's resolute opposition and unitarily declares its continuation of arms sales to Taiwan, the development of Sino-U.S. relations is being seriously threatened. U.S. supplies of weapons to Taiwan is an action that encroaches on China's sovereignty and interferes with China's internal affairs. This action cannot help but arouse the indignation of the Chinese people.

The history of the 30 years development of Sino-U.S. relations has proved that the development of economic and trade relations cannot be separated from the development of political relations. We must remember this historical lesson. Developing the political, economic and trade relations between China and the United States is the common desire of the peoples of the two countries and any actions that run counter to this trend are undesirable.

The trade between China and the United States must be carried out on the basis of each respecting the sovereignty of the other and on the basis of equality and mutual benefits. On this basis, there is a broad prospect for the further development of trade. As China and the United States differ in the stages of development of their economies, the commodity trade between them will enable each to get what it lacks from the other. In order to achieve this, there is still much room for further development. There is an even greater possibility for developing technical exchanges, cooperation in production and setting up joint venture enterprises. Sino-U.S. cooperation in exploring and exploiting offshore oil has just begun and there are still many things to do. We hope that the good desire of the peoples of the two countries can be realized.

BANGLADESH, YUGOSLAVIA STRESS NONALIGNED MOVEMENT

[Text] Dacca, August 18 (XINHUA) -- Bangladesh and Yugoslavia today resolved to exert maximum efforts towards further strengthening the Non-Aligned Movement and policy in the struggle for peace, equality and independent development of the people. In a joint communique issued here today at the conclusion of a 3-day official visit to this country by Radovan Vlajkovic, member of the Yugoslav Presidency, the two countries pledged to ensure a successful convening of the 7th summit of non-aligned countries.

They stressed the irreplaceable role and contribution of the policy and movement of non-alignment towards surmounting the current dangerous developments in the world. The two countries most resolutely condemned Israel's brutal actions against the Lebanese and Palestinian people, and called upon all international entities, especially the United Nations, to undertake energetic and effective measures to put an end to the war.

They stressed that a comprehensive, just and lasting solution of the Middle East crisis could be found only through the unconditional withdrawal of Israeli troops from all the occupied Arab territories and full respect for the Palestinian people's inalienable and legitimate rights to self-determination, including the right to return to and establish their own state on their national soil, headed by the PLO.

They urged that more efforts be made towards ending the Iran-Iraq war.

On the Afghan and the Kampuchean problems, the two sides held that a political solution should be found on the basis of related U.N. resolutions and the decisions adopted by non-aligned conferences, including the withdrawal of foreign troops from the two countries and full respect for the sovereignty, territorial integrity and non-aligned status of those countries.

They also stressed the importance of promoting cooperation between the non-aligned and the developing countries, and of strengthening collective self-reliance as a vital factor for their development.

The two countries expressed satisfaction with the successful development of their relations and cooperation and pledged to continue expanding these relations.

They also stressed the need to undertake genuine measures of disarmament and intensify the search for lasting peace and stability. The communique was issued at the end of Mongolian Foreign Minister Mangal Dugersuren's 3-day visit to India.

The two sides reiterated their commitment to the principles of peaceful co-existence and the norms guiding the relations between states laid down in the UN Charter, as the basis for promoting international peace, cooperation and understanding.

During the visit, the two countries signed two protocols for long-term cooperation in the fields of agricultural research and health. The two countries have agreed to form a joint consultative committee of experts to implement the protocols.

REAGAN ISSUES STATEMENT ON U.S.-PRC COMMUNIQUE

[Text] Washington, August 17 (XINHUA) — United States President Ronald Reagan issued a statement today on the U.S.-China joint communique. He said the communique "embodies a mutually satisfactory means of dealing with the historical question of U.S. arms sales to Taiwan" and "preserves principles on both sides", and "will promote the further development of friendly relations between the governments and peoples of the United States and China." "It will also contribute to the further reduction of tensions and to lasting peace in the Asia-Pacific region," he said.

Reagan went on to say in his statement that "building a strong and lasting relationship with China has been an important foreign policy of four consecutive American administrations. Such a relationship is vital to our long-term national security interests and contributes to stability in east Asia." He said: "It is in the national interest of the United States that this important strategic relationship be advanced." With the communique, Reagan said, it is possible to realize such national interests of the United States, consistent with its obligations to the people of Taiwan.

In his statement, Reagan emphasized again that his "long-standing personal friendship and deep concern for their (the people of Taiwan) well-being is steadfast and unchanged." He said he will maintain "the full range of contacts between the people of the United States and the people of Taiwan — cultural, commercial and people-to-people contacts — which are compatible with our unofficial relationship" "with the dignity and honor befitting old friends."

Reagan addressed the issue of U.S. arms sales to Taiwan in the context of the "Taiwan Relations Act" which was unilaterally introduced by the United States. He said that U.S. "arms sales (to Taiwan) will continue in accordance with the act."

Dealing with China's efforts towards peaceful unification of China, purely an issue of China's internal affairs, Reagan said that he is "with full expectation" that the approach of the Chinese Government to the resolution of the Taiwan issue will continue to be peaceful and that "our future actions will be conducted with this peaceful policy fully in mind."

Nevertheless, he continued to say that "the Taiwan question is a matter for the Chinese people, on both sides of the Taiwan Strait, to resolve. We will not interfere in this matter or prejudice the free choice of, or put pressure on, the people of Taiwan in this matter."

U.S. TEXTILE EXPORTS PROPOSAL REJECTED

[Text] Beijing, August 16 (XINHUA) — The first round of negotiations for a new Sino-U.S. textile agreement was held here between August 13 and August 16. During the negotiations, the U.S. side put forward a very unfair proposal, trying to impose strict, discriminative restrictions on China's textile exports to the United States. The Chinese side rejected the proposal and explained its principled stand on the new agreement for consideration by the U.S. side.

It was learned that during the negotiations, the U.S. side proposed to enlarge the scope of restriction on China's textile exports to the U.S., cut the quotas, delete some flexible clauses from the present agreement and reduce the average annual growth rate to less than one percent. It also wanted to revise the consultation clauses so that the U.S. side may take whatever actions it likes.

The Chinese side rejected the U.S. proposal on the ground that it runs counter to the basic principles of the agreement on trade relations between the two countries.

Li Dengshan, leader of the Chinese delegation and deputy director of the foreign Trade Administration under the Ministry of Foreign Economic Relations and Trade, refuted the U.S. view point with actual facts about China's textile exports to the U.S.

He recalled that China's textile exports to the U.S. started almost from zero, and in 1981 reached only 420 million U.S. dollars according to Chinese statistics, or less than 600 million U.S. dollar according to American statistics, falling far behind other major textile exporters to the U.S.

"A considerable proportion of China's textile exports consists of grey cloth, which is used as raw material by the American printing and dyeing and garmets industries and therefore is beneficial to the U.S. industry."

China's exports of garmets to the U.S. make up only 3.1 percent of total American textile imports, Li Dengshan said. Moreover, China exported only 54 categories of textile to the U.S. in the 1981, accounting for only half of the total categories the U.S. imported.

Li Dengshan said: "Some people in the U.S. have unduly described China's textile exports to the U.S. as having created problems for the American textile industry and employment and upset its market. This is inconsistent with the facts."

"China was a newcomer in the U.S. textile import trade and was not being treated fairly," Li Dengshan said. "China is strongly dissatisfied with the treatment it is receiving under the present agreement."

Li Denghsan said: "China's textile exports to the U.S. have not been allowed to develop in line with the actual needs and possibilities, but are subjected to strict and unfair control. The specific quotas for China's exports under the present agreement are even lower than the level already achieved when the agreement was signed. He said the rate of increase was much lower than the internationally accepted reasonable rate given to new exporters.

Li Dengshan pointed out: "After the first Sino-U.S. textile agreement went into effect, the U.S. side unrestrictedly used the consultation clauses to enlarge the scope of restriction and arbitrarily cut the quotas. It delayed consultations and unilaterally restricted imports, thus seriously holding up China's export of textiles to the U.S. and impairing China's economic interests."

Sino-U.S. textile trade was imbalanced, like Sino-U.S. trade as a whole, resulting in a big deficit on the Chinese side. "It is in the spirit of balancing mutual economic beneifts that China wants to increase its textile exports to the U.S.," he added.

The second round of negotiations is to be held in the U.S. The Chinese delegation believes that [it] is necessary for the U.S. side to give serious consideration to the grave trade imbalance and give Chinese textile exported to the U.S. fair and reasonable treatment under the principles specified in the Sino-U.S. trade relations agreement. This would provide a basis for success in the new round of talks.

[Special commentary by Chen Tiqiang [7115 7555 1730], vice president of the China International Law Society: "The Verdict of History"]

[Text] While revising and approving the textbooks, the Japanese Ministry of Education has distorted history and prettified Japanese militarist aggression. This has greatly infuriated the Chinese people and has been severely censured by the peoples of other countries invaded by the Japanese army and by the just public opinion inside Japan.

Certain legal questions were involved while Japan distorted history in the course of revising the textbooks: What is a war of aggression? Was the Japanese war against China, which took place from 1931 to 1945, a "war of aggression?' What was the nature of the Nanjing massacre according to international law? Was China interfering with Japanese domestic policy when it demanded that Japan correct the mistakes made in revising the textbooks? And so forth.

First, the question of the nature of the Japanese war against China is a question of fundamental importance. During the 14 years between the provocation of the "September 18 incident" by Japan in 1931 until the Japanese surrender on 15 August 1945, the Japanese army invaded and trampled on the vast territory of China, killed more than 10 million Chinese people and plundered and ruined an enormous amount of Chinese property. It was Japan which started the war, and the war was fought on Chinese territory. The aim of Japan's war was the extermination of China and the realization of its presumptuous plan of dominating the whole of Asia. Numerous international documents have made a solemn and just judgment on the Japanese invasion of China. This historical fact is borne out by hard evidence and cannot be denied.

On 24 February 1933 the General Assembly of the League of Nations adopted a report affirming that Japanese military actions after the "18 September incident" in Shenyang and northeast China "cannot be regarded as self-defense measures," nor can "the military measures taken by Japan throughout the course of the dispute be regarded as self-defense measures."

It was said in the declaration of United Nations signed on 1 January 1942 that The United Nations is "now engaged in a common struggle against the barbarous and brutal forces which vainly attempt to conquer the world."

On 1 December 1943 the "Cairo Declaration," signed by China, the United States and Britain, said: "The aim of fighting this battle is to put an end to and penalize Japanese aggression."

The "Potsdam Proclamation," signed by China, the United States and Britain on 26 July 1945 demanded that "Japan unconditionally surrender" and said that "the terms of the Cairo Declaration will soon be implemented."

On 2 September 1945 Japan signed the instrument of surrender and expressed its desire to "faithfully fulfill the terms of the Potsdam Proclamation." In fact, Japan had accepted the verdict of "aggression." It is absolutely impermissible for certain Japanese people to attempt to reverse the verdict today.

There have been stipulations in international law concerning the aggressive nature of the Japanese war against China. Article No 10 of the treaty signed by the League of Nations in 1919 pointed out: "Each member country of the League of Nations undertakes the obligation of showing respect for and maintaining territorial integrity and current political independence of all member countries of the League of Nations in order to guard against foreign aggression." Obviously, it is against the law to launch a war which violates territorial integrity and political independence of any member country, and other member countries of the League undertake the obligation of guarding against such "foreign aggression."

Article No 1 of the "Paris no-war pact" signed on 27 August 1928 stipulated that: The contracting nations abandon war as a tool of state policy. The indictment against the Japanese war criminals issued on 12 November 1948 by the Far Eastern International Military Court pointed out that: Making war in violation of the "Paris no-war pact" "should be regarded as committing a crime." In light of this, we see that wars of aggression had already been banned by international law before Japan launched its war of aggression. The Japanese Government was knowingly violating the law when it launched the war of aggression against China.

After World War II, there were more explicit legal stipulations prohibiting wars of aggression. Article No 4 of Provision No 2 of the UN Charter stipulated that "as far as international relations are concerned, all member countries must not violate territorial integrity and political independence of other member countries by threat of force or by other means which are not in accord with the purpose of the United Nations." The "definition of aggression" adopted at the General Assembly of the United Nations on 14 December 1974 pointed out: "Aggression" means the act of violating other countries' territorial integrity or political independence, which has been stated in the charter. The Japanese war against China was a 100-percent "war of aggression." If this was not considered as a "war of aggression," there would be no wars of aggression in the world.

When China and Japan established diplomatic relations in 1972, Japan pointed out in the "Sino-Japanese Joint Declaration" that "Japan feels terribly sorry for the great damage brought to the Chinese people during the war and will make a profound self-examination." "The Sino-Japanese Treaty of Peace and Friendship" signed in 1978 stipulated that "various principles laid down in the joint declaration should be strictly observed."

On what should the Japanese Government carry out "self-examination"? Of course, it should self-examine its criminal act of aggression. If there had not been aggression, there would not have been the need for self-examination. Now, on the one hand, the Japanese Government claims to "retain the stand of assuming responsibility for the war and carrying out a profound self-examination" that it expressed in the Japanese-Sino joint declaration" but, on the other hand, the Ministry of Education of the Japanese Government totally denies the Japanese invasion of China. Is this not contradiction?

The Nanjing massacre was a brutal atrocity, a rarity in human history. Regarding this, the Tokyo International Military Court issued an accurate and specific description. According to the investigations of the court, "Chinese troops had completely withdrawn before Nanjing was conquered by the Japanese army. Thus, what the Japanese army occupied then was a city which was powerless to resist." More than 200,000 defenseless Chinese people were killed by the Japanese army in the Nanjing massacre and about 155,000 were buried alive by the Japanese burying teams. The massacre and looting lasted for 6 to 7 weeks after Nanjing was conquered. All this was the conclusion drawn by the court after investigating the true evidence.

However, the high-ranking official of the Japanese Government said: "It is hard to judge the historical facts only by the statements made at the trial." This is, in fact, an attempt to fundamentally deny the Tokyo trial.

The Nanjing massacre was a serious violation of the code of war. When the Sino-Japanese war broke out, both China and Japan were parties to the 1899 "Hague Convention" concerning the law and conventional rules for wars on land. The code of wars on land attached to the convention stipulated that any attack on or bombardment of open towns, villages, residential areas or buildings is prohibited; looting in any town or any place is prohibited; looting on occupied territories is prohibited; the life and properties of individuals must be protected; and so on. Despising these rules, Japan had in fact knowingly violated the convention.

Generally speaking, the revision and approval of textbooks is a kind of internal affair of a country. But the content of the Japanese textbooks under revision involves the history of other countries and its relationship with the latter. The case is totally different here since the revised content may affect world peace and security and has run counter to Japan's international obligation to other countries. Thus, all countries concerned have, of course, the right to urge Japan to make an amendment and to ask it to undertake its obligation. Japan's tampering with the history of the Sino-Japanese war is not only an insult to the Chinese nation and an act to open a wide door to militarism, which harms international security and world peace, but it is also a violation of the obligations undertaken by Japan in the "Japanese instrument of surrender," the "1972 Sino-Japanese Joint Declaration" and other documents. All these are serious international issues which have a most important bearing on the interests of China and are by no means merely internal affairs.

From the above analysis we can come to an obvious conclusion; that is, before 1931, when Japan launched the aggressive war against China, a concept of "aggressive war" had already been clearly defined in international law. Such a concept has been more clearly specified in later years. In international law, there are also very clear stipulations prohibiting savage means of fighting. In order to enforce the militarist policy, Japan boldly violated the "League of Nations Treaty" and the "Paris Pact" and launched the aggressive war. After its defeat, Japan profoundly reproached itself for its crime in launching the war and stated that it would give up its ambition of conquering and aggressing against other countries. Under such circumstances, the Chinese people, in consideration of the friendship between the Chinese and the Japanese peoples, decided to give up all their claims for compensation in an effort to develop the friendship between the two countries from generation to generation. Japan's acknowledgement of its aggressive crime is the basis of the establishment of Sino-Japanese diplomatic relations. We earnestly hope that the Japanese Government will sincerely accept the historical lesson; understand the savage, evil and shameful nature of aggressive war; keep its promises and carry out its international obligations so as to safeguard world peace, as well as that of the Japanese people, and cherish the friendship between the Chinese and Japanese peoples from generation to generation; and will never try to shake the political and legal basis of Sino-Japanese diplomatic relations.

CHINA DAILY 15 Aug Commentary

[Text] Tomorrow is August 15.

On that day 37 years ago, the world was overjoyed to hear that the Japanese militarists had accepted the Potsdam declaration and surrendered unconditionally. Thus, the Second World War was brought to an end.

The date 15 August 1945, therefore, went down in history as a date that marked the victory of justice.

The day has been remembered ever since for the high price humanity paid to defeat fascism. This year, on this day, people in various countries of Asia, especially in China, have more to ponder: Why on earth are some Japanese distorting historical facts censoring their school textbooks?

In the half century before 15 August 1945, Japan was ruled by a group of militarists who pushed an aggressive politcy toward other countries. And China's territory was the first that they coveted.

In 1894 Japan invaded China and forced the imperial Qing government to sign the Treaty of Shimonoseki, forcibly occupied the Chinese territory of Taiwan and the Penghu Islands.

In 1905 Japan seized China's southern Manchuria railway and the Liaodong Peninsula when it won its war with Russia.

During World War I, Japan took the opportunity to snatch the islands in the Pacific orginally under German jurisdiction and the German concessions in China.

In 1927 the Japanese Cabinet, headed by Tanaka Giichi, launched a plan to occury northeastern China by force. In the notorious Tanaka Memorial is the brazen quotation: "If we want to conquer China, we must first conquer Manchuria and Mongolia. If we can conquer China, then all the other Asian and South China Sea states will become afraid of us and surrender to us."

With this criminal goal, the Japanese imperialists concocted the 18 September incident," occupied the northeast of China and set up the Japanese puppet "Manchukuo" regime.

On 7 July 1937 Japan launched its all-out aggressive war against China by instigating the Lugou (Marco Polo) bridge incident.

In the meantime, Japan also invaded other countries. In 1910 it annexed the whole of Korea. On 7 December 1941 it launched a surprise attack on Pearl Harbor, started the Pacific war and occupied a chain of Southeast Asian countries.

The rapacious aggrandizement of the Japanese militarists was invariably accompanied by massacre, plunder, raping and burning. In China alone, 18 million people were killed by the Japnaese aggressors. Millions more of the people in other Asian countries died at the Japanese militarists' hands.

These crimes were not only burned into the memories of all those who witnessed and survived them, but were put on record at the International Military Tribunal in November 1948, as well as in the confessions of the Japanese war criminals who were repatriated from China during the years after the end of the war.

More than once since the signing of its unconditional surrender has the Japanese Government formally acknowledged the crimes of aggression committed by their militarists, and expressed repentance. In the joint statement on the restoration of diplomatic relations between China and Japan in 1972, the Japanese Government expressed its deep shame over the grave calamities it had brought to the Chinese people. This was reiterated in the Sino-Japanese treaty of peace and friendship signed in 1978.

We are not recounting all this to bring the present Japanese people to account for all the wrongs done by Japanese militarists in the first half of the present century.

Even in wartime we drew clear distinction between the Japanese militarists and the Japanese people. As we are by no means trying to blame the present-day Japanese rulers for what their predecessors did.

But it was a gross violation of an international pledge when officials in the Japanese Ministry of Education deleted the word "aggression" in school textbooks in a vain attempt to whitewash Tojo Hideki and his company.

The Japanese people who earnestly wish to safeguard peace and Japanese national interests are strongly against the Japanese Education Ministry's attempts to distrot history. They have rightly pointed out that it is a criminal scheme to revive Japanese militarism, from which the Japanese people and people of other Asian countries suffered so much.

It is our hope that the Japanese Government will stick to the joint statement between the Chinese and Japanese Governments concluded ten years ago and take effective measures to correct the ministry's mistakes in distorting history. The sooner, the better.

The world is on its guard against any revival of fascism or militarism. As the Japanese militarists' dream of a "Greater East Asia Co-Prosperity Sphere" ended in ignominous failure in 1945, it will be even more unremittingly dealt with now that the people of China and the whole of Asia have grown in strength.

RENMIN RIBAO CRITICIZES JAPANESE WAR FILM

HK121509 Beijing RENMIN RIBAO in Chinese 11 Aug 82 P 5

[Article by Chen Huangmei [7115 5435 3561], vice chairman of the Chinese Film Artists' Association, "What Does the Japanese Film 'The Great Japanese Empire' Show?"]

The last thing I expected on my first visit to Japan was that I would be treated to such a film as "The Great Japanese Empire" on the afternoon of 7 July.

When the Lugouquiao incident occurred in 1937, I was in Peiping. Japanese militarists had started a new, rapid and ruthless war of aggression against China. I made my escape from Peiping. After the subsequent loss of Jinan and the battle of Xuzhou, I found my way to Wuhan. Then I headed for Yanan. I also had many interviews with the units of the 8th Route Army in the north China anti-Japanese base.

I saw for myself stretch after stretch of razed ground where the Japanese had dropped bombs or set fire to buildings at random. Burned bodies of babies lay scattered around — I saw picture albums released by the Japanese military headquarters, and seized by the 8th Route Army, that built up "the sacred great east Asia war." Openly displayed in the albums were pictures that showed Japanese troops massacring the Chinese people. Now still fresh in my memory is a picture in which a baby was sucking the breast of its blood-stained dead mother....

In a word, those Japanese atrocities of all kinds can best be summed up by the ancient Chinese saying: "Even by using up all the paper, words cannot describe the scene!"

Of course, we have always distinguished the Japanese militarists and their crimes from the average Japanese people. As a young reporter then, I was overwhelmed with indignation at Japanese atrocities.

But from the family letters and amulets found on the corpses of many Japanese soldiers, I noted their relatives prayerful hopes and wishes. I noted their grief, their sadness, their sense of desperation and their hatred for war. I knew that this war had also brought disaster to the Japanese people.

Moreover, I had made friends with a few Japanese soldiers of the antiwar alliance. They and I wore the same shoulder emblems of the 8th Route Army. In gray uniform, we walked the Taihang Mountains in the autumn sunlight, exchanging confidences. I deeply felt that in their contact with the Chinese people and fighters, they always displayed a sense of guilt deep down. Of course, they were also filled with hatred for Japanese militarism. They longed for their beautiful hometowns in Japan. They looked forward to Japan's future. How they wanted to establish friendly relations with the Chinese people for all generations to come. They even harbored sincere and innocent illusions....

The last thing I expected was that 45 years later, I would arrive in Tokyo from Beijing. On 7 July I again noted that some people in Japan had gone to the expense of shooting such "a colossal war film," using wording like "a reassessment of the war" and "a new understanding of the war" and even claiming in an appeal: "It is especially hoped that young people will come to see this film. It is hoped that everyone will join in discussing what war is and come to the cinema house to relive wartime lives...." (The words within quotation marks here are quoted from several filmmakers and directors in their propaganda literature for this film.) This inevitably aroused my indignation and set me thinking. What, after all, does this film want to get across?

The first and second parts of this film run for 3 hours. The film begins with the Pearl Harbor incident and a description of Japanese imperialism's instigation of the Pacific war and its invasion of Singapore and the Southeast Asian area. It ends with Japan's defeat in the war. The story is in chronological order. Some scenes from documentaries are put on to show its "veracity." The film is interlarded with the love stories of three young couples. Though the picture reveals certain crimes of Japanese troops in their invasion of Southeast Asia, it lays greater emphasis on portraying British and U.S. allied troops massacring the Japanese people at the time of defeat, as though Japanese soldiers and people were the main massacre targets.

The filmmakers and directors stressed that these were the "facts." But they did not expose the crimes of Japanese militarists who, several years after their aggression against the Chinese people, again joined forces with German Fascists and extended the war to the Southeast Asian region. On the contrary, they openly reversed the verdict on war prisoner Tojo. The screenwriter publicly declared that he wanted to try his best to portray Tojo as a loyal official "dedicated to the emperor and to the country," who died a martyr's death. There was the line spoken by Tojo:

"My war responsibility is limited only to within the country. This is a war in which an independent state (Japan) could not help getting involved to defend itself. I feel not the least shameful."

In a press conference before the shooting of the film began, the actor playing Tojo said in much clearer terms:

"Due to the failure of the war, the image of Tojo has all along been distorted. Facts have been concealed. I have accepted this role because I want to make the people of the younger generation understand through this enlightening film 'facts as they are.' Japanese, be proud: This is what I want to say in this film."

It can be seen that these filmmakers and directors have enthusiastically cited a top war prisoner representing Japanese militarism -- who rabidly carried out aggression and staged massacres in China and Southeast Asia and whose hands are stained with the blood of millions upon millions of people -- as a hero whom the Japanese should be proud of, in an attempt to invoke the spirit of Tojo. In fact, this is also an attempt to bring back "the great Japanese Empire" into the "order of great east Asia" which a small number of rightists in Japan once dreamed of establishing! Let us see how they have reassessed the war:

A filmmaker openly spelled out his aim in displaying enthusiasm for shooting this film. He said that he subscribed to the following viewpoint: "So long as states exist and mutually stress sovereignty, wars are unavoidable." Then, he unashamedly posed this question: "When countries are at war, can we actually distinguish which side is just or unjust, or which is a benign or malign" side? Therefore, it is necessary to "reassess" "the greatest tragedy of mankind in this century during World War II...."

Another filmmaker also said very frankly: "We dare to challenge the truths which have been hidden in the dark shadows of history and avoided as harmful. We want to rewrite the history of Japan and the Japanese people through a renewed understanding of war, shooting this film as a basis for pondering the contemporary period."

These naked confessions of these filmmakers and directors are really "challenges to truth"! Their common aim is only to portray through the film what they consider as "the hidden shadows of history" and "truths avoided as harmful" to prove the following imperialist gangster logic:

As we stress the sovereignty of our country, we must wage "a war of self-defense" and "enter" other countries -- the latter a new term now coined by the Japanese Education Ministry in the revised textbooks. So, war is inevitable and is neither benign nor malign -- there being no distinction between justice and injustice. "The victor judges the defeated." So, Tojo was sentenced to death by hanging. Tojo originally was not guilty. He was a hero "dedicated to the emperor and to the country." He died a martyr's death. The behavior of one who had been described for many years as a war prisoner should in fact be the pride of the Japanese (Japanese militarists and a small group of rightists)!

Finally, the filmmakers provided solemn music to accompany the heavy steps of Tojo as he headed for the gallows. The only thing missing was the cry, "Long live Tojo!" or "Long live the great Japanese Empire!"

This reactionary film has now been condemned by progressive Japanese film workers and the Japanese people. They call for it to be banned. The Chinese film workers have expressed warm support for this.

What particularly [words indistinct] "two Chinas." In the concluding captions of the film, they openly claim the participation of actors of the "Republic of China" in the performance. They also openly express thanks for the support of the "Civil Airline of the Republic of China" and the "Central Film Bureau of the Republic of China." Needless to say, many of the film's outdoor scenes were shot in Taiwan, as revealed by [words indistinct] for the revival of Japanese militarism and to serve "the great Japanese Empire."

REFUGEE DESCRIBES REASONS FOR LEAVING VIETNAM

OW181145 Beijing in Vietnamese to Vietnam 1400 GMT 16 Aug 82

[Interview by correspondents (Liu Hua) and (Cheng Ming) with "Brother" Son, a Vietnamese refugee, at a Guangxi refugee center -- recorded; date not given]

[Text] [Question] What is the reason behind your leaving your native land, parents and fatherland for a foreign country?

[Answer] I left my family and my parents for a foreign country because it became increasingly clear to me that the Hanoi authorities were invariably deceiving the people in the realization of their objectives while ignoring the people's sufferings. Following the total liberation and reunification of our country in 1975, I thought I had a chance to contribute to national reconstruction and to making it a prosperous and powerful socialist country. But following total liberation, Vietnamese economic and social conditions increasingly worsened and deteriorated beyond my imagination. Many commodities were not on sale, and those put on sale were sold at increasingly higher prices. The Vietnamese people in general lived in want and poverty. Draft-age Vietnamese youths were forced to join the army and fight on the battlefield. Our country is now at peace, and the enemy is gone. Where do they send those drafted youths? They send them across the border at Tay Ninh to Kampuchea. They said the youths are going to help a friendly country, liberate a neighboring country. That is not true. They have deceived the people, deceived those youths. The present Hanoi administration, that is, the Le Duan clique, pursuing its hegemonistic policy, wants Vietnam's neighbors to become its colonies. They send those youths to serve as cannonfodder. If I had not fled from my country, I, like hundreds of thousands of other Vietnamese youths, would have been forced to hold a gun and fight on the battlefield and live a life full of hardships. What should I shed my bloof for? Would it do any good for my fatherland? I did not want to live the life of a criminal and fight an unjust war waged by the Le Duan clique. Therefore, I fled my country for a foreign country.

[Question] How did the Hanoi administration draft you?

[Answer] I was called up twice by the Hanoi administration since February 1979, but I dodged both calls. The Hanoi administration then failed to give me any ration cards and sent me to a new economic zone. But soon afterwards, I left the new economic zone and returned home, living the life of a vagrant, away from my family, and without food.

That was because I did not want to join the army. Previously, I was a member of a cooperative where I worked for nearly 4 years. After receiving a callup order for a preinduction physical checkup, I left the cooprative and dodged the call because I did not want to live away from my family and fight on the Kampuchean battlefield. That was because I learned of the deaths of many of my friends on the Kampuchean battlefield, because I did not want to kill human beings uselessly in an unjust war.

[Question] Do you think that all of your unfortunate friends also died uselessly on the Kampuchean battlefield?

[Answer] Some of my friends died a tragic death on the Kampuchean battlefield some time after their induction into the army. I pity them very much and feel very sad whenever I think of their deaths. One of my friends is Tran Chi Cuong, who used to live at 28, Cat Dai Street, in Haiphong. He was drafted in April 1978. I do not know the date of his death. I only learned that his family received his death notice more than 1 year after his induction into the army. He was killed on the Kampuchean battlefield.

[Question] Did you tell your parents of your departure?

[Answer] Yes, I did tell my parents of my plan, and I left with their agreement. My mother cried when she bade me farewell. I was extremely moved when I embarked the boat for my escape. I had no choice but to leave my country because if I stayed behind I would not know what would happen to me. Therefore, I had to muster all my courage to overcome my feelings at the moment of departure. As we separated, my mother said: "Leave now, my son, to live a peaceful, tranquil life. Return to us when peace is restored in our country." My head reeled as I faced my mother. I was very sad and countless thoughts revolved in my head. The fact was that I had to live away from my family, seeing my weeping mother, my hatred for the present Hanoi regime intensified. I thought I would become an exile and rejoin my family when my country is completely liberated.

LEBANON'S AL-WAZZAN ON WITHDRAWAL NEGOTIATIONS

[Text] Beirut, August 17 (XINHUA) -- Lebanese Prime Minister Shafiq al-Wazzan declared today that the negotiations on the evacuation of the Palestinian guerrillas from Beirut had concluded. The prime minister told reporters after meeting with U.S. presidential envoy Philip Habib that the Lebanese Government would formally request tomorrow the United States, France and Italy to join the multinational force in Beirut. He added that the Lebanese Cabinet would discuss and approve the concluded agreement Wednesday.

250 French soldiers have reportedly left an Italian port for Beirut. They are scheduled to arrive in Beirut on Friday. 800 U.S. Marine Corps are also sailing to the capital of Lebanon. PLO leader Yasir 'Arafat and over 900 Palestinian fighters will reportedly go to Tunisia after they evacuate Beirut.

Israeli Defence Minister Ariel Sharon this afternoon discussed with Habib the PLO reply to the request for release of an Israel pilot. Sharon threatened that Israel would not permit the departure of a single Palestinian guerrilla as well as the deployment of the multi-national force until the release of the Israeli pilot.

The U.S. mediator is thought to return to Israel Wednesday with the final agreement. His assistant Morris Draper will go to Damascus to negotiate the evacuation of Syrian forces.

MITTERRAND REAFFIRMS FRANCE'S MIDDLE EAST POLICY

OW181900 Beijing XINHUA in English 1837 GMT 18 Aug 82

[Text] Paris, August 17 (XINHUA) -- French President Francois Mitterrand said over television here tonight that France's Middle East policy is a "policy of presence, equilibrium and peace." The French president reaffirmed France's three principles on the Middle East situation: "The right of the Israeli people to live in peace within the secure frontiers of a state recognized and respected by all; the right of the Palestinian people to dispose a fatherland and to create their chosen institutions on it; and the right of the Lebanese people to recover their unity and independence which are trampled upon today."

Mitterrand said France has "privileged relations" with the Middle East and it has "particular duty" to "perpetuate" the relations.

He expressed his support for "a policy of peace" in the Middle East and stressed that "the only way that will make it possible to obtain the goal is to choose negotiation instead of war." He noted that "the antagonistic sides should be disengaged, and foreign troops in Lebanon should leave there. At present, efforts should be made to enable the Palestinians to withdraw without losing face." He confirmed that France would participate in the multi-national troops to be stationed in Lebanon.

In his television speech, Mitterrand especially emphasized the issue for France to oppose terrorism at present. "The terrorism in Paris is part of an act of war by certain Middle East countries ... seeking to punish France for its pacifist role," he said. He also announced a series of measures to fight against terrorist actions.

According to reports, terrorist activities have been intensified recently in France. Since July this year, the nation has seen over 100 terrorist attacks. Paris has been attacked several times of late.

ARGENTINA PROTESTS UK INTERCEPTION OF BOATS

OW131838 Beijing XINHUA in English 1651 GMT 13 Aug 82

[Text] Buenos Aires, August 13 (XINHUA) -- The Argentine Government has instructed its missions to the United Nations and the Organization of American States to lodge a strong protest against the recent interception by British warships and aircraft of Argentine fishing vessels in the South Atlantic. A communique issued last night by the Argentine Foreign Ministry says: "This aggressive act is designed to maintain by force a colonial state which is unacceptable." "It attempts to sabotage Argentina's territorial integrity in waters under Argentina's jurisdiction by preventing Argentine fishing vessels from engaging in peaceful and legal fishing," it adds. The communique holds Britian responsible for anything that may happen in the future.

An effective and just peace, the communique says, is possible only through Britain's lifting of the "blockaded zone" and its sanctions, through the pullout of its troops occupying the (Malvinas) Islands, the call-back of its warships, including nuclear-powered submarines, and through negotiations in good faith with Argentina in line with relevant U.N. resolutions.

FIVE AIRCRAFT HIJACKERS EXECUTED IN SHANGHAI

OW191143 Beijing Domestic Service in Mandarin 1000 GMT 19 Aug 82

[Text] According to XINHUA, counterrevolutionary aircraft hijackers Sun Yunping, Yang Feng, Gao Keli, Xie Zhimin and Wei Xueli were executed by a firing squad in Shanghai this afternoon.

The five criminals hijacked Flight No 2505 flying from Xian to Shanghai on 25 July and committed the counterrevolutionary crime of hijacking the aircraft.

The criminal court of the Shanghai Intermediate People's Court tried the counterrevolutionary aircraft hijacking case of Sun Yunping and associates on 10 August. In the course of the trial the court displayed the instruments used by Sun Yunping and the others for the hijacking which had been seized on the spot, and read out the testimony. Yang Jihai, captain of Flight No 2505, and Liu Zhaoxian, a mechanic, were present in the court as witnesses.

According to the court's investigation, Sun Yunping, Yang Peng and Gao Keli consulted each other many times on hijacking a place to flee abroad in April this year. In June this year, Sun Yunping and Yang Feng enlisted Xie Zhimin and Wei Xueli to take part in this counterrevolutionary act. The five criminals used every means to prepare funds and instruments needed for the criminal act. Before embarking the plane, they divided the work for their criminal act of hijacking the aircraft.

Flight No 2505 took off from Xian at 0807 on 25 July. When the plane flew over Wuxi at 1003, Sun Yunping, Yang Feng and the three other criminals separately dashed into the cockpit, used brutal force to try to force the airliner personnel to change course and to flee abroad and violently wounded many crew members and passengers. The crew members and passengers bravely fought them. As a result, they subdued this pack of counterrevolutionary thugs.

During the court trial, Sun Yunping and the four other criminals confessed to the crime they had committed. In the afternoon of 11 August, the criminal court of the Shanghai Intermediate People's Court continued the open trial of Sun Yunping and the others for hijacking an aircraft using counterrevolutionary violence. The court held: Sun Yunping and the four other criminals remained hostile to the political power of the people's democratic dictatorship as well as to the socialist system. With a counterrevolutionary purpose in mind and using sinister means, they hijacked a civil aviation aircraft, trying to flee the country. Their crime was extremely serious; the plot was particularly insidious, and it was a terribly evil act. In order to safeguard the people's democratic political power and the socialist system and to maintain public security, the court sentences Sun Yunping and the other four criminals to death and deprives them of their political rights for life as counterrevolutionary hijackers on the basis of the provisions of Article 100, paragraph 3; Article 103; and Article 53, paragraph 1, of the Criminal Law of the People's Republic of China.

After the court passed the sentence, Sun Yunping and the others filed an appeal to the Shanghai Municipal People's Higher Court. After examining the case and holding two sessions, the Shanghai Municipal People's Higher Court held that all the facts presented had been confirmed, that ample evidence had been presented and that the application of the provisions of the law had been correct. It decided to uphold the original sentence and turned down the appeal filed by Sun Yunping and the four other criminals. It also referred the case to the Supreme People's Court for examination and approval according to the law.

In accordance with the order issued by the Supreme People's Court, the Shanghai Municipal Intermediate People's Court executed Sun Yunping and the four other counterrevolutionary hijackers before a firing squad this afternoon.

NEED FOR CONTROLLING POPULATION GROWTH DISCUSSED

Zhao Ziyang Remarks

[Text] Beijing, 18 Aug (XINHUA) -- State Council Premier Zhao Ziyang said today that to control the population is our fundamental national policy and must be continued for a long time.

At present, it is necessary to continue to pay keen attention to the work of family planning. It is especially necessary to study new situations in the rural areas arising from the introduction of the production responsibility system and sum up and popularize new experience in family planning so that the work can cope with the new situation.

Premier Zhao Ziyang and Peng Chong, members of the CPC Central Committee's Secretariat, met at Zhongnanhai with responsible persons of planned parenthood departments in all provinces, municipalities, autonomous regions and PLA units attending the national family planning work conference and had discussions with them.

Zhao Ziyang said: Population control is an important matter which can never be neglected. Population planning is a major component of the long-range plan for socioeconomic development we are mapping out. Failure to effectively control the population will deal a serious blow at the future building of the four modernizations in China. We must strive to limit the population to under 1.2 billion before the end of this century.

Discussing the basic conditions in our country, he pointed out that, first of all, China has a vast population but little arable and reclaimable land. Second, although China is rich in agricultural resources, per capita share of the resources is not large. A huge population can also affect the quality and character of the nation. In view of the national interest, it is imperative to control the population.

He said: All localities must strengthen the leadership in striving to do a good job in family planning. At the same time, it is also necessary to conduct surveys and study, probe and analyze new problems and sum up new experience in order to look for more effective means of family planning. He said he was delighted to note that family planning work has changed the people's thinking and transformed social customs and practices.

He added that it is necessary to do a good job in research, production and supply of contraceptives, an important guarantee for successful family planning work.

Speaking at the discussion meeting, Comrade Peng Chong said family planning is difficult work among the masses. He praised comrades working at the frontline of family planning for working hard without complaint, overcoming difficulties and scoring great achievements.

Present at the discussion meeting were also Chairman Qian Xinzhon, Vice Chairmen Wang Wei, Zhou Boping and Ji Zongquan and adviser Li Xiuzhen of the State Family Planning Commission.

Beijing Radio Commentary

OW172110 Beijing Domestic Service in Mandarin 1200 GMT 16 Aug 82

[Station commentator's article: "Population Growth Must Be Placed Under Stricter Control"]

[Text] Since the CPC Central Committee and the State Council issued a directive on making further efforts in doing a good job in family planning work in February of this year, the whole country has conscientiously implemented the directive, and the cadres and masses have enthusiastically responded to the call urging each couple to have only one child. The situation in family planning work, as in production and construction, is very good.

Now, more than 15 million couples in the country have received single child certificates, and more than 100 million couples of childbearing age are consciously practicing contraception and birth control. According to statistics for newborns for the first half of this year, about 60 percent are their parents' only child, an increase of 4 percent over the same period for last year, and the percentage of new babies born to couples already having one or more children has dropped even further. This fully demonstrates the power of the central directive and the Chinese socialist consciousness of the need to practice birth control for the sake of the four modernizations.

However, we should see that the population growth control task remains very arduous. With improved economic conditions, the desire to have more children has grown stronger among the peasants. The traditional forces of habit, mainly the idea of regarding men as superior to women, seriously obstruct the in-depth development of family planning. At the same time, our country has a large population, the average age of which is young, and more than 10 million couples will marry and have children each year. Even if each couple has only one child, more than 10 million babies will be born each year, which is equivalent to the total population of a middle-sized European country. This will place tremendous pressure on our socialist economic development.

We should soberly see that the population peak will continue for more than 10 years. Relaxation will lead to an even larger population growth. The CPC Central Committee's goal of keeping our population below 1.2 billion by the end of the century must be achieved with resolute, unwavering efforts.

Population control and production and construction are equally important. The leadership at all levels should pay attention to both and place family planning work on the agenda. The number one and number two men should personally handle the matter. It is necessary to give priority to propaganda and education work. It is imperative to continue to vigorously encourage late marriages, having children at an older age, having fewer children and the practice of eugenics so that the broad masses will understand the great strategic significance of controlling population growth and consciously and willingly practice the principle of one child for each couple.

We hope that the comrades on the family planning front will continue their achievements, overcome shortcomings, unite the people of the whole country and make new contributions to accomplishing the four modernizations and fulfilling the vitally important startegic task of population control.

Deng Yingchao Message

["Congratulations and expectations" -- Deng Yingchao's message congratulating first nationwide children's theater festival]

[Text] First of all, I wish the first nationwide children's theater festival held since the founding of the PRC success! I extend to all comrades and friends participating in the festival my heartfelt thanks and respects!

Writing and performing plays for children is a very glorious and meaningful thing and is not an easy job. It calls for continuous efforts in exploring and creating. Mr Lu Xun said: "To the new children, we must give new works." I hope that our children's theatrical workers will, under the guidance of the party's principles on literature and art, make persistent efforts and go to live in the world of children to understand the psychology, interests and likes of children of the 1980's, so that they will create new works loved by the children and encourage the children to make progress.

The work of appraising children's plays is an important link in developing and enriching the creation of children's plays. I hope that our dramatic theorists will pay close attention to research on children's plays!

GUANGDONG RURAL AREAS ENTER 'SECOND GOLDEN AGE'

HK190831 Beijing ZHONGGUO XINWEN SHE in Chinese 0128 GMT 18 Aug 82

[Feature by reporter Fang Yuansheng (2455 6678 3932): "Rural Areas of Guangdong Enter 'Second Golden Age']

[Text] During the 3 years since the convocation of the 3d Plenary Session of the 11th CPC Central Committee, there have been profound changes in the rural areas of Guangdong Province. The peasants are advancing on their way to prosperity. In their own words, the peasants say they have entered "the second golden age" since the founding of the PRC.

The Peasants Are Beginning To Be Rich

When the reporters came to Panyu to gather news 2 years ago, there was a bumper early rice harvest. The granaries of all the communes were bursting with grain and there was a storage problem. Therefore all the communes appealed for a solution from the county government. Liu Yuncheng, vice chairman of the county people's congress, personally went to the countryside to arrange the building of temporary granaries. He was accorded lavish hospitality by the peasants everywhere he went. The "Golden Age" was first mentioned by the peasants of this county.

Later on, news came that the peasants of Chen village of Shunde County became rich by planting "(mi zi lan) [4717 0098 5695]" and they built a "milan mansion," and more news came from Zhongshan County of peasants becoming 10,000-yuan families by raising pigs. Of course, these phenomena are not universal. We quote such material here just to explain one thing: The peasants are beginning to be rich, and the richness of some individuals has gone beyond people's imagination.

According to the statistics of sample investigations made of several tens of thousands of peasant families in the whole province by the departments concerned, the total income of the rural people's communes (not including fishery communes, which have much higher income; the same applies in following references) and the three levels (commune, brigade and production team) of the whole province in 1981 increased by 23 percent compared with the record level of 1980. Of that, the portion distributed to commune members increased by 28.3 percent; the average distribution per person (meaning collective distribution; the same applies in following references) was 130 yuan, an increase of 27 yuan over 1980. If the income from household sideline production is added, the average income per person in the rural areas of the whole province in 1981 could reach 215.7 yuan. This is not far from reaching the 300 yuan per person per annum set by the government, known as "comparably well-off."

Rural Areas Build Spacious Houses on a Large Scale

The richness of peasants is also manifested in the "craze for building houses." There is an old saying in Guangdong: "A man's richness or poverty is judged by his house." In addition to dressing warmly and eating their fill, the peasants desire nothing more than to build their residences. According to the statistics of the Guangdong statistics bureau, in 1981 more than 680,000 peasant households built houses occupying an area of more than 36 million square meters. The amount of investment for building these houses reached 1.8 billion yuan, but people engaged in actual work here hold that the figures probably exceed the above, and that around 1 million peasant households built houses occupying 40 million square meters. The number of houses built in 1980 was close to that in 1981. It is said that the counties of Chaoyang, Puning, Jieyang and Chaoan of Shantou Prefecture; Fengshun in Meixian; and Panyu, Shunde, Zhongshan, Dongwan, Xinhui and Nanhai in the Zhujiang delta show the highest numbers of houses built. Even the impoverished mountainous regions of north Guangdong and Hainan have also built large numbers of houses. As a matter of fact, the "craze for building houses" is a happy event, but it has also caused "worries," because it occupies a large amount of fertile farmland. In particular, house building in Chaoyang County of Shantou Prefecture has 30,000 mu of fertile farmland in the past 3 years. The 10,000 new houses built by the peasants of the whole county are all multi-room and spacious houses; the only thing lacking is that they did not built luxurious residences. It is said by the departments concerned that the "craze for building houses" will increase and not decline. It may drop a bit in Shantou Prefecture, but will increase in other prefectures. Due attention had been paid to the occupying of large areas of farmland, and measures have been taken to prevent this.

A Guangdong County and Brigade Were First in the Whole Country To Become Rich

There are a few notable features in rural Guangdong's advance to prosperity that merit our attention. One is that the number of rich counties, communes and brigades has greatly increased. Take average distribution of 300 yuan per person as a standard: Of the 109 counties and cities throughout province, only 2 counties reached the standard in 1980. In 1981 seven places — Nanhai, Zhongshan, Zhuhai, the Foshan suburbs, Shunde, Dongguan and the Zhaoqing suburbs -- reached the standard. Of the 1,991 communes throughout the province, the number that reached the standard in 1980 and 1981 were 46 and 114 respectively. As to the brigades and production teams reaching this standard, they are too numerous to mention. The second thing is that impoverished counties are decreasing. Take average distribution of under 60 yuan per person as a standard:

In 1980 there were nine impoverished counties; in 1981 the number decreased to only two. In 1980 22.7 percent of brigades were impoverished, but in 1981 this dropped to 12.1 percent. A number of impoverished communes and brigades have entered the ranks of rich communes and brigades. The third thing is that in a disaster year, the peasants have increased their income. Due to natural disaster the output of 1981 decreased by 1.18 billion jin compared with 1980, but the total income of the collective economy and the commune members' distribution were not reduced, on the contray, they greatly increased compared with 1980. The fourth thing is that the "conspicuous" counties, communes and brigades are striving to attain further and higher achievements. Nanhai Country, the richest county in the whole country, was the first county to surpass the average of 300 yuan per person in 1980 (the actual figure was 317 yuan). In 1981 they reached 340 yuan, and continued to be the best among the counties. Dongguan's Shatian Commune increased average distribution by 100 yuan per person in 1981 on the basis of 407.9 yuan in 1980, thus becoming one of the 14 communes in the whole province with an average distribution of over 500 yuan per person. In 1980, Yumincun brigade of Fucheng Commune, Shenzhen, reached an average of 2,074 yuan person, ranking first in the whole province and the whole country as well. In 1981 they leaped to a record 2,532 yuan. Even then, they were surpassed by Luohu brigade of Fucheng Commune, Shenzhen, which is located near the Jiulong customs and separated from Hong Kong by a river. Recently this brigade has relied on its favorable condition of being situated in the special economic zone to actively develop its collective economy, and attained average distribution of 3,535 yuan in 1981, ranking first in the whole province and the whole country. Even the income of Hong Kong peasants may be too inferior to bear comparison.

The Meritorious Deeds of Overseas Chinese and Hong Kong and Macao Compatriots in Supporting Their Home Villages Cannot Be Overlooked.

During the past 3 years, rural Guangdong's advance to prosperity has been due to the correctness of the agricultural policy of the CPC. In major matters, we have broken the "leftist" line of "concentrating solely on grain," the agricultural structure has been rationally readjusted and agriculture, forestry, animal husbandry, sideline production and fisheries are all comprehensively developing. According to the latest data, the per unit output of early rice this year reached 560 jin, while total output increased by 900 million jin, both reaching an all-time high. Considering this year's natural disasters and the reduction in grain area by 1.2 million mu after readjustment can this not be described as a "breakthrough"? Besides, the output of sugarcane in the 1981-82 refining season was 1.3 million tons, the highest on record. Fisheries also increased by a large margin. The sown areas of bananas, pineapples, lychees and oranges and tangerines have also surpassed previous levels. This proves that the distribution of the present agricultural structure is rational, and it has promoted the development of agricultrual productive force. Moreover, 92 percent of the production teams have instituted the system of production responsibility. This has smashed "egalitarianism" and enabled the peasants to keep decisionmaking power in their own hands, and brought their positive factors into play. The last reason is attributable to the success of the policy of the CPC of opening up to the outside world. The profound changes of Guangdong rural areas are inseparable from the patriotic spirit of overseas Chinese and the compatriots of Hong Kong and Macao. In addition to the various donations, compensation trade and processing of material for foreign businessmen have all accelerated the development of commune and brigade enterprises in rural areas. These meritorious deeds of the overseas Chinese and Hong Kong and Macao compatriots cannot be obliterated. Every commune in Dongguan Country, and even the majority of the brigades, are processing materials for foreign businessmen, and this is also the case in many of the communes of Foshan Prefecture. This undoubtedly promotes the rapid increase of the distribution level of the communes and brigades.

RESULTS OF ECONOMIC READJUSTMENT EXAMINED

[Text] Beijing, August 18 (XINHUA) -- The latest materials provided by the State Statistical Bureau showed that China's economic readjustment has led to sound growth of the national economy and brought more benefits to the people.

The market is brisk, while prices generally remain stable, with ample supplies of foodstuffs and daily-use manufactured goods. State revenue exceeded expenditure in the first half of 1982. Currency recovery during the period reached 4,385 million yuan, 405 million yuan over the first half of 1981. Other facts showing the healthy state of the economy include:

-- China has accelerated the growth of its agriculture and light industry since 1979 and re-oriented the production of heavy industry to make it turn out a wider range of products for various sectors of the national economy.

-- After increasing its total agricultural output value by 18 percent in the three years 1979-1981, China this summer again reaped a good winter wheat harvest, bigger than last year's. A good early rice crop is being gathered and the autumn crops are growing well.

-- China's light industrial production, which grew by 48.1 percent between 1979 and 1981, went up by 9.6 percent in the first seven months of this year over the same 1981 period.

-- After the readjustment started in 1979, China slowed down the development of heavy industry as originally planned. Heavy industrial output value increased by only 1.4 percent in 1980 and then, in 1981, went down by 4.7 percent. After re-orienting production and widening its scope of services, heavy industrial production rose by 9.7 percent in the first seven months of this year, compared with the same period of 1981.

-- The three major sectors of China's national economy -- agriculture, light industry and heavy indistry -- which were in imbalance before, are now showing coordinated growth. This is one of the major aims of the economic readjustment.

-- Although output of some heavy industrial products not needed at present was trimmed, output of building materials, some types of rolled steel and electric power in urgent demand has been raised year by year. Output of strip steel and sheet steel for making manufactured goods rose by 76 and 128 percent respectively in the first seven months of this year, compared with the same period of 1978.

-- State spending for the consumption by the people rose to take up 71.7 percent of the national income in 1981 from the 63.5 percent in 1978, while the proportion for accumulation dropped to 28.3 percent last year from the 36.5 percent in 1978.

-- In construction, the state appropriated 49,300 million yuan for culture, education and public health facilities, municipal construction and workers housing between 1979 and 1981. Such investment for improving the material and cultural life of the people accounted for 41.2 percent of total state investment in construction in 1981 compared with 17.4 percent in 1978. The heavier spending on improving the life and welfare for the people is another keynote of the current readjustment.

-- In foreign trade, the total value of exports exceeded imports in the first half of 1982.

China is now continuing its economic readjustment, including readjusting the product mix, technological make-up and the line-up of enterprises.

ARTICLE ON IMPORTANCE OF BOYS OVER GIRLS REBUTTED

[Article by Qin Liyan]4440 4539 6056]: "'Giving More Importance to Boys Than to Girls' Is a Product of the Society Under Private Ownership"]

[Text] Comrade Jie Gang held that "giving more importance to boys than to girls" is "above reproach." He contended that "long ago, during the clan commune era, a "matrilineal" society existed in the beginning, but was later changed to a "patrilineal" society. This change reflected progress and showed that women are no good and must yield to men." This writer feels it hard to subscribe to his view.

Naturally, from the viewpoint of social development, the replacement of "matrilineal" society by "patrilineal" society is progress. However, this progress only showed that society was progressing, and can in no way be explained as "women are no good." Following the appearance of "patrilineal society" was the rule of men over women and the great changes in women's role and position in society. We all know that in a "matrilineal society," communal families" were generally established and public ownership was practiced. With men going hunting and women doing housework, everyone was engaged in public labor needed by society. Under such circumstances, men and women were equal and there was no problem of "giving more importance to boys than to girls." Later on, as a result of developments in production and surplus products, private ownership gradually came into being and "communal families" disintegrated. This gave rise to "patriarchal families" and each family became an economic unit in society. At that time, housework labor lost its public demand and became private labor. As a result, wives became servants of the families. Families of the patriarchal system were actually families of the slave system. That is why Engels said: "The earliest class oppression emerged simultaneously when men enslaved women."

From the above we can see that before the emergence of the system of private ownership, women's role and position were not damaged. They made the same contributions as men did to society. After the emergence of the private ownership system, their labor was excluded from social production and they became inferior to men in both role and position. Therefore, it is easy to understand that "giving more importance to boys than to girls" is the product of the system of private ownership. It accompanies the emergence as well as the extinction of the system of private ownership. As a historical phenomenon, it did not exist from the very beginning and will not exist forever. When private ownership is eliminated and the individual family is no longer the main economic unit of society, women will return to public labor and regain their social role and position alongside men. They will hold up half the sky and the idea of "giving more importance to boys than to girls," left over for thousands of years, will be thoroughly cleared away.

In China, private ownership has already been eliminated and we have practiced equality between men and women and the principle of equal pay for equal work for men and women, which has thoroughly emancipated women. Women are able to do anything men can do and they are bringing their roles into full play. Failing to see this historical change, Comrade Jie Gang still sticks to the feudal moral idea of "men are respectable while women are petty and low," uttering that women are unable to do anything. This is absolutely inappropriate.

33 FOREIGN OIL COMPANIES BID FOR OFFSHORE OIL

[Text] Beijing, 17 Aug (XINHUA) -- At 1600 today, the first round of bids for the exploitation of our country's offshore oil resources in cooperation with foreign enterprises was announced closed.

The China National Offshore Oil Corporation (CNOOC) received bids from 33 foreign oil companies. According to people familiar with the international petroleum industry, the enthusiasm shown by the bidders for cooperative exploitation of petroleum resources has rarely been seen elsewhere in the world in the last few years.

China began work on the first round of bids for offshore oil resources in cooperation with foreign enterprises on 16 February this year. Open for bidding in the first round were 43 sections in 7 geophysical survey areas in the South China Sea and the southern part of the Yellow Sea. Most of the foreign oil companies were pleased with the areas offered in the first round of bids and regarded the areas as attractive. They were especially interested in the sections offered in the South China Sea, regarding the area as one of the most promising areas in terms of long-range oil prospects offered for bidding by various countries of the world. The foreign oil companies which submitted applications made rather full preparations before submitting bids. Some of the companies formed bidding groups, while other companies bid individually. Quite a number of foreign oil companies bid on more than 10 sections each.

The CNOOC has set up a special organization to evaluate the bids; this organization will open the sealed bids forwarded by the foreign oil companies and will spend about 3 months' time to comprehensively evaluate the terms offered by the various companies. The companies offering better terms will be chosen to negotiate with the CNOOC, and the winning bidders will ultimately sign contracts with the CNOOC. It is estimated that petroleum exploration operations will officially begin in the South China Sea and the south Yellow Sea after the second quarter of 1983.

RENMIN RIBAO ON APPLYING SCIENCE TO PIG RAISING

[Commentator's article: "Science Must Be Applied to Pig Raising"]

[Text] Changsha County in Hunan has achieved notable results by popularizing scientific pig raising. The number of pigs and amount of pork sold have greatly increased and the production cost has been reduced. The peasants have increased their incomes and made even more contributions to the state. This shows that to reform the backward methods of pig raising and to apply scientific pig raising are aspects which cannot be overlooked.

For the past few years, the country's pig-raising industry has developed rapidly and pork production has increased annually. The supply of pork to the people in urban and rural areas has improved greatly. However, the people's standard of living has continuously improved and the pig-raising industry should also be continuously developed. This requires, first, stabilizing the bonus system and second, doing a good job in scientific pig raising. According to statistics in the "China Agricultural Yearbook, 1980," the number of live pigs (amount of livestock on hand) at the end of 1978 accounted for 41.1 percent of the world total, but pork production accounted for 20.3 percent. The annual average marketing rate of pigs in some advanced countries with highly developed animal husbandry systems is over 120 percent, whereas in China it is only some 60 percent. This proves that China has a large number of pigs but less pork, a lower rate of marketing pigs, poor raising techniques and low economic results. On the other hand, it has shown that there is great potential in pig raising to be exploited. According to estimates of the department concerned, if half the rural households engaged in pig raising throughout the country can reach the scientific standard of pig breeding of Changsha County, the quantity of pork supplied to society will be worth noting.

Chinese peasants have a tradition of pig breeding as well as rich experiences in this respect. However, some experiences are not scientific, or were suitable in the past but not for the present. These old methods and customs must be reformed. For example, formerly peasants held that "in order to produce a jin of pork, we must feed the pigs several jin of grain; the more we feed, the more pork will be produced." They also considered that "pig breeding does not make money; we should do farm work instead." This means that pig breeding only serves for collecting manure. These viewpoints cannot stand before the facts provided by Changsha County. After applying scientific pig raising in this county, the quantity of pig fodder did not increase to any great extent, but the number of pigs sold and the pigs' weight increased throughout the country; pork output last year increased by 16 million jin compared with 1978, and the average income of commune members was 68 yuan. This is a major way for the peasants to earn more money.

In the past, we followed a tortuous course in pig raising. This was because we did not probe the scientific method in pig breeding. We just unilaterally stressed the amount of livestock on hand and overlooked the economic results. In some years in the past, we made big investments in large pig farms and wasted grain. Through the historical experiences, we realized that to apply scientific pig raising, we should proceed in all cases from the national situation and pay attention to economic results. This is the key point for achieving good results in pig raising. At present, our industry still remains undeveloped, agricultural capital and grain are greatly limited, and it is impossible to adopt foreign methods in pig raising by consuming a lot of grain in pig breeding. However, our country has more than 100 million peasant households engaged in pig breeding, rich natural sources and rich sources of green and coarse fodder. This is a superior point. Many regions also have reliable pigs kept for breeding and technical force in animal husbandry. According to these basic conditions, we should give full play to the advantages and overcome the shortcomings and bring into play our superiority. In scientific pig raising, we should emphasize reforming pig-raising techniques in more than 100 million peasant households throughout the country. In this reform, scientific research departments, breeding and veterinary centers, state-owned and collective pig farms, and fodder-processing factories should actively enhance their role as key members in providing reliable pigs for breeding, in epidemic prevention, fodder processing and popularizing pig raising techniques. Many localities' experiences have shown that it is possible to rapidly raise the economic results of pig raising whenever we do a good job in the raising of pigs for breeding, and give full play to the crossbreeding superiority of these pigs. If we can further improve fodder quality and feeding method, the results will be even more satisfactory.

We must assiduously and perseveringly popularize scientific pig-raising techniques among the peasants and do more practical work. Changsha County persisted in improving, step by step, good pig breeding and capital construction, epidemic prevention and fodder processing systems, and trained the animal husbandry technical personnel in a planned way. The county eventually made notable achievements.

To transform the old pig-raising habits and customs of the peasants handed down through the centuries would change pig raising and production. We should advocate and study the high enthusiasm and good work style of the comrades in Changsha County in serving the peasants and continue this change.

REPORT ON DEVELOPMENT OF HIGH-QUALITY MATERIALS

[Text] Beijing, 17 Aug (XINHUA) — According to a report obtained from the state scientific and technological commission by a XINHUA reporter, new materials developed by China have played an important role in national economic and national defense construction.

According to preliminary statistics, in the 3 years from 1979 to 1981, China's metallurgical, chemical industry, material, light industry, textile, petrochemical, science and educational departments succeeded in developing and improving more than 9,000 kinds of new high-quality materials. These materials, used in national economic and national defense construction, have ensured the successful launching of carrier rockets and manmade satellites and stimulated the development of new technologies and products for civilian use. The application of these new materials has created a new industry in the country, and this industry is gradually expanding, thanks to China's own efforts.

Aviation lubricating oil, which China succeeded in producing after a few years of hard world, is used by civilian aircraft in the country. Import of this kind of lubricating oil is no longer necessary. Besides, more than 300 kinds of airtight materials used by civilian aircraft have been successfully produced. In addition, a certain amount of key raw materials for large-scale 1k and 4k integrated circuits, such as monocrystal silicon, superpure gases and reagents, can be supplied domestically.

Gas-removing agents are an important material to maintain a vacuum in electronic devices and to enable them to function normally. The four kinds of gas-removing agents developed by China are up to advanced world standards. Hot spray painting technology (welding) and the related materials used are a special technology and special materials to protect metal surfaces. They can be used in manufacturing new products as well as in renovating old products and can prolong the lifespan of equipment and its parts. In the past few years China has succeeded in popularizing and applying this technology in the aviation, metallurgical, coal mining, machinery and petrochemical fields. In 1981 alone, about 100 million yuan in profits were made from this technology.

In recent years, materials such as rubber, plastic and airtight parts for hydraulic presses used in coal-mining equipment had to be imported, but China has now succeeded in manufacturing these materials. Their application in production has saved foreign exchange for the country. Other new materials, such as fuels for carried rockets, are not only self-sufficient but are also exported to other countries.

ENGINEERING DATA ANALYSIS METHOD — Shanghai, August 6 (XINHUA) — China is now ahead with a few other countries in the research and use of a new engineering analysis method, which is known to professionals as the "finite element method". This was the unanimous view expressed by scientists from more than 30 countries and Hong Kong attending an international conference on the method which ended in Shanghai today. At present, efforts are being concentrated on popularizing its knowledge for wider application in China. The Shanghai meeting on finite element method was held jointly by the Architectural Society of China, the Society of Civil Engineering of China, the Society of Mechanics of China and the Department of Civil Engineering of the University of Hong Kong. A total of 550 papers were received by the meeting, which was attended by Chinese scientists and scientists from countries including the United States, Japan, Britain, Australia, the Federal Republic of Germany, Portugal and France, as well as from Hong Kong. JIANGXI URGES CONSOLIDATING BASIC PARTY UNITS

AW181121 Nanchang Jiangxi Provincial Service in Mandarin 1100 GMT 16 Aug 82

The meeting analyzed the situation regarding grassroot party organizations and regarding party members in our province. It pointed out that the majority of the grassroot party organizations and party members are good or fairly good. They have united and led the masses to implement the line, principles and policies set by the 3d Plenary Session of the 11th CPC Central Committee and have given play to their role as fighting fortresses and vanguards in realizing socialist modernization. However, a small number of grassroot party organizations in various localities and on various fronts have been unable to function as fighting fortresses because they have been lax and weak, or even paralyzed or semiparalyzed. There have been a small number of politically incompetent party members who are basically not qualified to be party members. Furthermore, an extremely small number of party members have become degenerated and have totally ignored the requirements to be advanced elements of the proletariat. Such problems have seriously impaired the party's prestige among the masses, weakened the party's fighting strength and obstructed the four modernizations.

The meeting maintained that, in consolidating the grassroot party organizations, the stress must be placed on ideological consolidation, that is, by improving these party organizations through education, regarding ideological education as the central task in consolidating the grassroot party organizations and regarding consolidation as a process of carrying out penetrating and widespread education on Marxism-Leninism-Mao Zedong Thought. After the 12th CPC Congress, the party members must be organized to study the political report of the congress, the party constitution and other relevant documents so as to ensure successful ideological consolidation. We must keep in mind the problems of grassroot party organizations and those among party members and deal with these problems by educating the party members on communist ideals, the party's lines and policies, basic party knowledge and the need to repudiate the inroads of capitalist ideas so as to raise the party members' communist consciousness and strengthen the party organizations" fighting strength.

The meeting stressed that the key of consolidating the grassroot party organizations lies in consolidating and building the leading groups of the grassroot party committees, general party branches and party branches, combating their laxity and weakness and solving the problems of paralysis and semiparalysis so that they will become strong fighting fortresses in realizing socialist modernization.

Addressing the meeting, Comrade Di Sheng, deputy secretary of the provincial party committee, stressed the urgent necessity of intensifying the consolidation and building of the grassroot party organizations.

ACHIEVEMENTS IN GUANGDONG REORGANIZATION CITED

HK180917 Guangzhou Guangdong Provincial Service in Mandarin 1000 GMT 17 Aug 82

[Summary] "Initial results have been scored in the reorganization of 460 enterprises in Guangdong Province. Since the industrial output value of these enterprises accounts for 43.8 percent of the total budgeted industrial output value in this province, doing a good job in reorganizing and running these enterprises is very important to the development of the excellent industrial situation in the province."

Beginning in April this year, more than 1,300 cadres from the relevant provincial, prefectural and municipal departments have been sent to these enterprises to make investigations and give guidance in the overall reorganization. They have mainly reorganized the leading bodies of the enterprises so that such phenomena of leading bodies being aged, overstaffed, uneducated and lacking professional cadres as well as weakness and laxity in these leading bodies could be changed. They have also consolidated labor organization, strengthened labor discipline, improved management and perfected various economic responsibility systems in the enterprises. As a result, the enthusiasm of the masses has been mobilized and better economic results have been achieved.

"After 3 months of reorganization, the economic returns of the 460 enterprises have generally been increased and the rate of increase at these key points is higher than that in the general areas. According to the statistics of those provincial enterprises included in the state budget, which have been reorganized in this period, their industrial output value in the first half of this year increased by 21.8 percent over the corresponding period of last year. This was higher than the increase of 9.8 percent achieved by other enterprises in general areas. There was also an increase of 17.1 percent in the profits they gained in this period, which was also higher than the 7.25 percent achieved by other enterprises in general areas."

GUANGDONG HOLDS CONFERENCE ON ENTERPRISES

HK181508 Guangzhou Guangdong Provincial Service in Mandarin 1000 GMT 18 Aug 82

[Summary] The Guangdong Provincial People's Government recently held a conference in Huizhou Municipality on straightening out industrial and communications enterprises. Vice Governor Li Jianan presided over the conference and delivered a speech.

This conference conveyed and studied the spirit of the national forum on straightening out enterprises, the instructions of leading comrades of the State Council and the instruction of provincial CPC committee First Secretary Ren Zhongyi on industrial returns must be raised, enterprises must be straightened out, technology must be transformed and politics must be strengthened. Enterprises must be straightened out one by one and products must be improved one by one. Leadership groups must be reinforced with people who have knowledge of management." In the light of this spirit, this conference laid stress on analyzing the current situation in straightening out enterprises and the existing problems and looked into and made arrangements concerning the issue of straightening out enterprises.

In his speech, Li Jianan emphatically pointed out: "Straightening out enterprises in an all-round way and carrying out comprehensive management is an important reform in the enterprise management system. It is essential to firmly grasp the main contradiction and do well in resolving the contradiction." He said that in the course of straightening out enterprises, it is necessary to solve the following several problems.

First, it is necessary to straighten out and build the leadership groups of enterprises well. Straightening out and building the leadership groups of enterprises is the key to straightening out enterprises in an all-round way. We must boldly select middle-aged and young cadres who have professional knowledge, for leadership groups. Second, it is essential to straighten out labor organizations. We must organize production according to the fixed number of workers and the fixed quotas. Straightening out labor organizations is an important measure for reducing redundant organs of enterprises and redundant personnel, enhancing efficiency and observing discipline. In straightening out enterprises, we must reinforce the production front-line with young and energetic people who have high political awareness. Third, it is imperative to further perfect the economic responsibility system. Fourth, we must link the straightening out of enterprises with the readjustment and transformation of enterprises. We must continue to close, suspend and merge enterprises and shift to other types of production. We must link doing well in straightening out enterprises with doing well in current production. Regarding enterprises whose products do not meet the needs of society, which consume a large amount of energy resources, whose management is chaotic and which have long incurred losses and have competed with advanced enterprises for raw materials and motive power, we must properly close, suspend and merge them or shift to other types of production.

[Text] The Hunan Provincial People's Government held a governor's executive conference on 12 August to discuss the procurement of agricultural and sideline products. Sun Guozhi, governor of the province, spoke at the conference. He said this year the procurement of agricultural and sideline products in our province will show a great increase. We must conscientiously improve our service and enthusiastically receive the masses. We must make things as convenient as possible for the masses. All purchasing stations should be furnished with tables, chairs and stools. There should also be a stand at which tea is served to the masses. To do a good job in the procurement of agricultural and sideline products is a major affair that concerns the protection of the initiative of the peasants and the promotion of production development. The government and commercial supply and marketing departments at various levels should earnestly grasp this work.

HEBEI'S TANGSHAN CITY BUILDS INDUSTRIAL SECTOR

[Text] Shijiazhuang, Aug 18 (XINHUA) -- An entirely new district with factories, shops and a hundred blocks of apartment buildings has appeared in earthquake-flattened Tangshan, according to city officials.

The new district, covering seven square kilometers, is situated 25 kilometers from the Tangshan city proper, and is designed to be a new industrial area. More than 100,000 workers from different parts of the country have worked at the building sites which were previously farmland.

Apartment buildings with a total floor space of 328,000 square meters have been completed and more are under construction. Anti-quake measures have been taken in designing and in selecting and using building materials. More than 20,000 people have moved into apartments in the new district which will eventually have a population of 70,000, according to a spokesman of the Tangshan municipal construction office.

The new district is serviced by a new waterworks and has its own networks of shops and schools. The broad streets in the new district are lined with trees. Two factories, a cotton textile mill and a printing and dyeing mill, have been completed and seven factories are being built. The seven are: A rolling stock plant, which will be one of the major plants producing and repairing passenger cars in China, a cement plant, to be the biggest in northern China, a gear plant, a dyed-yarn weaving mill, a woolen mill, a factory making machines for light industry and a tailoring workshop. In addition, a heat and power plant with a generating capacity of 75,000 kilowatts and a silk textile mill are designed to be built soon. As a result, the new district of Tangshan City will become an industrial center producing building materials, machinery, coaches and textiles, according to the Tangshan municipal construction office.

After the earthquake in 1976, the state made investigation on the reconstruction of the reconstruction of the city. In 1977 it decided to establish three sections -- the city proper, a new industrial district and a mining area. With an area of 40 square kilometers, the city proper is situated in the old city site. Tangshans administrative units and most of the factories have been reconstructed in the city proper. Aseismatic precautions have been taken in housing construction.

The new industrial district is located to the north of the city proper, and the mining area to the east of the city proper. Forming a triangle, the three sections are 25 kilometers apart from each other.

Construction has proceeded on these three sections simultaneously. Buildings with 10.17 million square meters of floor space have been completed, including 5.78 million square meters for residential quarters. In all, 90,000 families have moved into new apartments.

FURTHER REACTION TO U.S.-PRC COMMUNIQUE

President Chiang's Speech

OW181740 Taipei Domestic Service in Mandarin 1200 GMT 18 Aug 82

[Text] Chairman Chiang Ching-kuo of the Kuomintang made an important speech while presiding over a meeting of the KMT Central Committee at 0900 on 18 August.

Chairman Chiang said: The United States and the Chinese Communist regime yesterday issued a so-called joint communique. The Ministry of Foreign Affairs has solemnly expressed a firm position and at the same time recounted the details of negotiations carried out in the last few months.

At this juncture, our party needs more than ever to solidify its revolutionary determination and rally all forces at home and abroad to help carry out our fundamental national policy of anticommunism and national recovery. Therefore, I deeply hope that compatriots of the whole country and comrades of the whole party will not be (?fooled) by the Chinese Communists' peaceful united front work smokescreen nor be perplexed by transitory international developments. They should demonstrate their revolutionary moral courage with full national self-confidence. In the face of adversity, we should strengthen ourselves for trials ahead, relinquish all selfish ways of thinking and enhance our solidarity and self-reliance. This is the way to follow late President Chiang Kai-shek's instructions: Don't be disquieted in time of adverse change, be careful in preparation and judgment, be firm with dignity and be self-reliant with vigor.

In the past we relied on this invincible revolutionary spirit to overcome all difficulties. We should continue to rely on this same righteousness and dedication to carry on our still more strenuous endeavors of still greater magnitude.

Our party's firm adherence to the basic policy of anticommunism and national recovery demonstrates its sense of responsibility for the history and culture of our nation and also for the freedom and well-being of all our people at home and abroad. The sacrifice and struggle of all our people, military and civilian alike, in the past three decades has laid an indestructible foundation for the great undertaking of national recovery and reconstruction. As long as our compatriots and comrades exert themselves with one heart and one will, we will certainly be able to fulfill the historical mission of national recovery.

Assembly Speaker

[Text] Taipei, Aug. 19 (CNA) -- People from throughout society here were in great dismay and felt deep regret over the Washington-Peiping agreement intending to restrict arms sales to the Republic of China, Kao Yu-jen, speaker of the Taiwan Provincial Assembly said Wednesday.

In an interview with the CENTRAL NEWS AGENCY, he said the United States as a leader of the free world should not appease the Peiping regime at the expense of the Republic of China and treat an old ally this way. The continuing supply of arms is necessary for this country's defense, and the ROC will not only safeguard the security of the bastion of Taiwan but also help improve the U.S. position in promoting stability in the western Pacific region, he noted.

To impose restrictions both in quality and quantity for future sales will seriously damage this country's defense efforts, he said, adding that it would at the same time adversely affect the U.S. position in maintaining peace in this part of the world.

In the meantime, political parties, civic bodies, private organizations, academic institutions, religious leaders, business and industrial groups in this country expressed deep regret over the so-called joint communique, saying that the U.S. Government has compromised its principle under coercion from the Peiping regime and has violated the Taiwan Relations Act which provides at least adequate safeguard to the security of the Republic of China and its 18 million people.

Radio Commentary

[Station commentary: "Mainland Today": "The Motives and Results of Blackmail"]

[Text] The most detestable thing in this world is blackmail. It is the most despicable crime of all. [Words indistinct] the atrociousness of the criminal who hurts others to benefit himself by means of blackmail by far surpasses that of robbers and bandits. In the past, when Communists were bandits and robbers in various parts of the country, the most destestable means they employed were kidnapping and blackmail. [Words indistinct] since the Communist bandits occupied the mainland, they have harbored and abetted international blackmail, kidnap and hijack criminals. For a time, all international murderers, hijackers or kidnappers took refuge in Communist bandit areas or were supplied with arms by Communist bandits to make trouble in the world. To acquiesce Communist bandits' action is, in itself, blackmail against all democratic countries of the world [words indistinct].

This time, the Communist bandits and the United States issued a so-called communique. This has been long since been firmly believed to be an act of blackmail. At first, they appeared ready to downgrade the relations with the United States. [Words indistinct] their conditions were discontinuation of arms sales to the Republic of China, abrogation of the Taiwan Relations Act and U.S. assistance to their carrying out peace talk and united front schemes. The aim of these three conditions was, of course, to obstruct relations between the Republic of China and the United States and undermine the Republic of China's position in order to pave the way for their armed invasion of Taiwan.

The Chinese Communist bandits' current blackmail and extortion have been internationally exposed. News media in the United States has long reported on them. In the eyes of people all over the world, this blackmailer is no different from robbers and bandits. Many people have been puzzled. They had believed that it was altogether unnecessary for the United States to put up with the Chinese Communist bandits while the latter had to expect much from the former. The Chinese Communist bandits would never really dare to downgrade relations with the United States. Why has the United States accommodated the Chinese Communist bandits and why should the Chinese Communists bandits resort to blackmail?

Many believe that the Chinese Communist bandits had their own calculations: 1) To put themselves in a higher position by synchronizing U.S. playing of the so-called China card and Chinese Communist bandits' putting up an anti-Soviet posture. 2) To capitalize on the Reagan administration's wish, before the off-year election, to avoid a low ebb in relations between the United States and the Chinese Communist bandits. 3) After the announcement of the convening of the 12th puppet congress [words indistinct], to lobby in the United States that it was necessary to protect Teng Hsiao-ping and that he mustn't be let down.

Another point is to trial test the advocacy of enhancing relations between the United States and the Republic of China made by President Reagan before and after he took office. The above-listed may be said to be the motives of Chinese Communist bandits' blackmail of the United States. At the same time, they could accomplish the scheme of undermining our government by forcing the United States not to sell us arms.

Judging from the so-called communique issued by the Chinese Communist bandits and the United States, the Chinese Communist bandits did not achieve much of what they had expected from this blackmail. But they have been duly appeased. Reagan's so-called diplomatic relations with the Communist bandits were clarified. Regarding the arms sales problem, although they are not to be discontinued, many restrictions have been placed. Moreover, a [word indistinct] has been left for Chinese Communist bandits' renewed blackmail later, that is, "make every effort to adopt measures and create conditions conducive to the thorough settlement of this issue." It is conceivable that this 7th clause will be utilized by the Communist bandits to give the United States endless quibbling and difficulty. Besides, bandit Teng Hsiao-ping may use this communique to demoralize Yeh Chien-ying, Hua Kuo-feng and company at the forthcoming 12th puppet congress to convenience bandit Teng's lackeys' [words indistinct].

However, to put it fairly, the Chinese Communist bandits did not get all what they had wanted from the blackmail. The United States did not totally [words indistinct] on the Taiwan Relations Act issue. It refused to agree to quickly discontinue its arms sales to the Republic of China. It (?paid no attention) to Communist bandits' peace talk [words indistinct]. The day will come when President Reagan will thoroughly understand the Communist bandits' schemes.

In his statement, President Reagan stressed that he would never alter his basic stand. He clearly and specifically stated that he would totally observe the Taiwan Relations Act. He stressed that the Taiwan problem should be solved by the Chinese on both sides of the Taiwan Strait themselves and that the United States would not [word indistinct], take sides or apply pressure. In short, the problem should be solved by the people themselves. All this shows that, basically, the United States did not want to meet the Communist bandits' blackmail demands.

President Chiang Ching-kuo [words indistinct] that our firm adherence to the fundamental policy of anticommunism and national recovery demonstrates our sense of responsibility for the history and culture of our nation and also for the freedom and well-being of our people at home and abroad. He said that we should follow the late President Chiang Kai-shek's behest "don't be disquieted in time of adverse change, be careful in preparation and judgement, be firm with dignity and be self-reliant with vigor in facing all trials and adversities and [words indistinct]." In short, the resolution of the China problem depends on safeguarding the Chinese people's democratic and free life and on the achievement of exercising their free will. The Communist bandits' perpetrations today are designed to prolong their enslavement on the mainland and preserve their political power, in order to indefinitely control the mainland Chinese and deprive them of their rights to democracy and freedom forever. [Words indistinct] the United States will not dare to make an enemy of all the Chinese people by whetting the Communist bandits' ambitions. As long as we are firmly self-confident, self-reliant and self-strengthening, the destiny of China will be held in our hands forever. We are not the least afraid of these apparant and transit adversities and pains.

CHUNG KUO SHIH PAO Article

[Text] Washington, 11 Aug -- Senator Barry Goldwater, Republican elder statesman, disclosed today that President Reagan will never recognize the Chinese Communists' claim to sovereignty over Taiwan or the Republic of China.

Goldwater today met with all the members of the foreign affairs observation and friendship delegation of the Legislative Yuan of the Republic of China led by Legislative Yuan Vice President Liu Kuo-tsai. A spokesman of the North American Affairs Coordination Council here said that Senator Goldwater told the highest public-opinion representatives from the Republic of China that he will never recognize the Chinese Communists' claim to sovereignty over the Republic of China and that "President Reagan acknowledges this too."

At the meeting, Goldwater stressed to Vice President Liu Kuo-tsai and others that at least over half of the U.S. senators firmly support the Taiwan Relations Act and that U.S. congressional support for the Republic of China is far greater than reported by the press.

The nine-member delegation of the Legislative Yuan today also called on Senator Charles Percy, chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. Chairman Percy told the legislators of the Republic of China: The Taiwan Relations Act is in the interests not only of the people of the Republic of China but of the United States. If the Chinese Communists invades Taiwan by force, they should consider the U.S. position and interests. Otherwise, it would constitute an encroachment on U.S. interests.

At noon, Representative Edward Derwinski, ranking Republican member of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, gave a banquet in honor of all the legislators of the delegation. Also invited were more than 10 congressmen who strongly support the Republic of China. Tsai Wei-ping, representative, and S.K. Hu, deputy representative, of the North American Affairs Coordination Council, were also present.

At the banquet, Representative Derwinski and Representative Kemp, who saw President Reagan recently in the White House, stressed that Reagan had assured them that he would never desert an old friend, the Republic of China on Taiwan.

In a telephone interview with our reporter, Representative Derwinski said that he and his House colleagues also had a discussion with the legislators from the Republic of China on the "quality" and "quantity" of U.S. arms sales to Taiwan in the future. It is reported that the United States will put limitations on the "quality" and "quantity" of future arms supplies to Taiwan. However, Derwinski and the other congressmen indicated that such "qualitatives" and "quantitatives" limitations "will change with the situation; and if the Chinese Communists become more aggressive, the quality and quantity of the weapons will naturally be upgraded."

Congressmen Derwinski, Crane, Solomon and Kemp sincerely asked the legislators from the Republic of China to frankly tell them of any help they could give, and they promised to do everything in their power. They unanimously indicated that Congress will not agree to revise the Taiwan Relations Act.

The senators and representatives who met with the delegation today also indicated that they did not approve of the signing of a new joint communique between the United States and the Chinese Communists. If, unfortunately, there should be such a joint communique, they assuredly will join hands with other congressmen and form a powerful group to prevent the communique from producing any harmful effects. However, they pointed out to the legislators from the Republic of China that so far there is no indication that a so-called joint communique will come into being.

Hodlridge, assistant secretary of state for east Asian and Pacific Affairs, James Lilley, director of the American Institute in Taiwan, and Dr (Siegal), head of the Asian Affairs Department of the White House National Security Council, also met with Vice President Liu Kuo-tsai and party today. Director Lilley gave a small cocktail party to welcome all the legislators in the delegation.

Tomorrow morning (12 August), Senator Hayakawa, chairman of the East Asian and Pacific Affairs Subcommittee of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, will give a lunch in honor of the legislators from the Republic of China. The delegation is scheduled to conclude its visit to Washington on Friday.

CHIANG CHING-KUO MEETS YUAN MISSION TO EUROPE

[Text] President Chiang Ching-kuo yesterday received the Europe observation group of the Legislative Yuan. He urged members of the group to help promote people-to-people diplomacy and take the opportunity to learn from others' strong points and improve our own shortcomings.

President Chiang received Hung Chad-nan, leader, and Tsai Yu-tu, deputy leader, of the group yesterday morning at the presidential office. After he was briefed on the group's formation, President Chiang expressed a few hopes. First, when having contacts with overseas Chinese and students studying abroad, the group members are expected to express greetings and solicitude to them on behalf of the government. Second, as the European countries lack understanding of conditions in our country, the observation group is expected to take the opportunity to give more publicity to our country's actual progress to enhance mutual understanding and subsequently promote the development of substantive relations. Third, while we are engrossed in our own efforts, we may overlook our shortcomings. So, the group is expected to take the opportunity of the trip to learn from others' strong points and improve our own shortcomings.

In their report to the president, Hung Chao-nan and Tsai Yu-tu especially stressed that in addition to visiting overseas Chinese, students studying abroad and units stationed abroad, the group will call on influential politicians and members of parliament in various countries and will at the same time study their parliamentary systems and other relevant matters.

NEWSPAPERS COMMENT ON SINO-U.S. COMMUNIQUE

TA KUNG PAO

[Special dispatch from correspondents Lu Te-jun [0712 1795 3387] and Hou Tung-hai [0186 2639 3189] in Beijing: "People in Beijing Yesterday Discuss Sino-U.S. Communique"]

[Text] Since its publication, the Sino-U.S. joint communique on settling the issue of U.S. arms sales to Taiwan has become the main topic of discussion here. The reporters had an interview with specialists on international questions and well-known figures, Huan Xiang, Qian Duansheng and Lin Liyun, and asked them to talk about their views on this question. They said: After a discussion between China and the United States for nearly 10 months, they have reached an agreement on settling the issue of U.S. arms sales to Taiwan one step at a time until its eventual and thorough solution. Although this agreement has not yet thoroughly settled the issue, it marks the beginning of the settlement of this issue and has eased a crisis which for some time seriously threatened Sino-U.S. relations. This is a good thing.

They said that the joint communique has reaffirmed the fundamental principles guiding Sino-U.S. relations in all aspects, which are: "mutual respect for territorial integrity and sovereignty and noninterference in each other's internal affairs." Therefore, the United States must settle the issue of its arms sales to Taiwan according to the principles mentioned above, that is, it should terminate its arms sales to Taiwan as early as possible. Otherwise, it will make known to the world that it is perfidious. The United States has already committed itself to doing three things. Now we are waiting to see what the United States will actually do. It is obvious that through contacts in dealing with this issue, the United States has come to understand that the Chinese Government and the Chinese people will never make any unprincipled concession on this important issue which involves the country's sovereignty. Should the United States not truly live up to its promises and delay settling this issue under any excuse, Sino-U.S. relations will certainly face yet another grave crisis. They said: The so-called "Taiwan Relations Act" formulated by the United States seriously contraveness the principles of the joint communique on the establishment of diplomatic relations between China and the United States. The Chinese people and the Chinese Government have always been opposed to this act. If anyone attempts to confuse this joint communique with the "Taiwan Relations Act," he is holding forth all alone in defense of his own views and is acting against the spirit and substance of the communique. We will never agree to or accept such deeds. These well-known figures also said to the reporters: Undoubtedly, the publication of the joint communique is a heavy blow to the Taiwan authorities. The Taiwan authorities meant to resist, with the support of the United States, the motherland's call for peaceful reunification and expected the rupture of Sino-U.S. relations, but now their hopes have fallen through. In the joint communique, the United States reiterates that it recognizes the PRC as the sole legal government of China, that Taiwan is part of China and that it will only maintain people-to-people relations with Taiwan. The United States also states that it has no intention of pursuing a policy of "two Chinas" or "one China, one Taiwan" and expresses that it understands and appreciates the Chinese policy of striving for a peaceful resolution of the Taiwan question. Therefore, these well-known figures also sent word to the Taiwan authorities: As the old saying goes, "whosoever understands the times is a great man." The gentlemen of the Taiwan authorities should be aware of the trend of the times. Although within a certain period of time, Taiwan can still expect to buy some arms from the United States, it is after all not a permanent solution to be dependent on the pleasure of others. We hope that the Taiwan authorities will treasure the righteous cause of the nation, forget about past grudges and work hand in hand with us to fulfill the great cause of the motherland's reunification.

[Special dispatch from correspondent Chen Hsiang [4453 5046] in Beijing: "Sino-U.S. Relations Have Made Some Progress"]

[Text] Beijing, 18 Aug -- According to people familiar with foreign affairs in China, the joint communique issued by China and the United States yesterday is for promoting an improvement in the relations between the two countries on the important issue of principles. However, how big this improvement actually is mainly depends on the action of the United States and its sincerity in implementing the communique.

Two Points in This Communique Have Made Some Progress Compared With the Communique on the Establishment of Diplomatic Relations

According to the analysis of these people, two points in this communique are improvements compared with the Shanghai Communique and the communique on the establishment of diplomatic relations. First, the United States has promised not to engage in the political activity of "one China and one Taiwan" or "two Chinas." This is unprecedented. The words used in the Shanghai Communique were, "the United States acknowledges that all Chinese on both sides of the Taiwan Strait maintain that there is but one China" and "the United States does not challenge that position." The communique on the establishment of diplomatic relations clearly stated that the United States recognizes the Chinese People's Republic as the sole legitimate government of China, and also acknowledges that Chinese position that there is one China and Taiwan is a part of China. This was an improvement compared with the Shanghai Communique. Moreover, this present communique is a further improvement on the communique on the establishment of diplomatic relations.

Secondly, on the question of arms sales to Taiwan, this present communique has laid down the principles and orientation for the resolution of the question. The United States has promised three points: 1) Arms sales to Taiwan will not exceed, either in qualitative or in quantitative terms, the level of those supplied in recent years since the establishment of diplomatic relations between the United States and China. 2) Sales of arms to Taiwan will be gradually reduced. 3) This will lead, over a period of time, to a final resolution. This has pointed out the way for solving the difficult problems in Sino-U.S. relations. Judging from the two aforementioned points, this communique has averted a retrogression in bilateral relations, and to a certain extent, also brought about an improvement in relations.

However, they pointed out that the key to the problem will depend on whether the United States will live up to its promises in the future. The Chinese side is rather reserved regarding this. This is not only because the United States has continued to treat Taiwan as an independent political entity in the 4 years since the establishment of diplomatic relations but also because it has continued its arms sales to Taiwan. This has caused people to doubt the sincerity of the United States. Even more alarming is the fact that after the announcement of the present joint communique, some important political figures in the United States have published statements expressing the need to continue to make commitments to Taiwan. This more than ever has caused people to be on guard against whether or not the United States is engaging in double-dealing and arbitrarily interpreting the contents of the communique. If this is the case, the danger of retrogression in Sino-U.S. relations still cannot be ruled out.

People of the diplomatic circles in Western Europe hold that this communique still cannot fundamentally resolve the question and is only using a method acceptable to both sides to shelve the question for the time being, but they express relief over the extrication of Sino-U.S. relations from the present crisis. They also estimate that both China and the United States must still carry out arduous diplomatic activities in the future before a final resolution results.

HSIANG KANG SHIH PAO

[Editorial: "The United States Has Gone so Far as To Succumb to the CPC Blackmail -- on the 'Joint Communique' Issued by Washington and Peiping"]

[Tex t] The Government of the United States of America and the puppet regime of the CPC yesterday issued the so-called "joint communique" on future U.S. arms sales to the Republic of China [ROC]. It was reported when Alexander Haig was secretary of state that the United States and the CPC would issue the so-called "Shanghai communique No 2." Yesterday's issuance of the communique formally materialized the reportedly "Shanghai communique No 2" and also confirmed that under the CPC's pressure which coupled threats with promises, the U.S. Government failed to be steadfast in its stand in the end and went so far as to succumb to the CPC blackmail. We cannot very well avoid pointing out that this is a major deviation in the Reagan administration's policy toward the ROC. The free people of China and the people on the mainland who are kept in slavery are firmly opposed to this deviation. Moreover, American people with insight will not agree with the deviation.

When the so-called "joint communqiue" was at the deliberation and hearsay stage, many people thought that Haig had formulated the Reagan administration's policy to appease the CPC and to be hard upon free China. Following Haig's resignation, many people thought that the appeasement atmosphere within U.S. political circles would be lessened. They even thought that there would be a cautious change in the direction of U.S. foreign policy. However, the fact is that the United States is currently implementing a Haig line without Haig. Therefore, people cannot but express their indignation and show much surprise at the line.

When the aforesaid hearsay became rather prevalent, leaders of 28 important U.S. organizations held a press conference on Capital Hill on 8 July. During the press conference, they issued a joint statement, unanimously supported the correct stand of the ROC, opposed the White House policymaking level's practice of excessively yielding to the demand of the CPC and particularly opposed Secretary of State Haig's compromise attitude toward the CPC. Their joint statement noted: "If President Reagan approved the implementation of the (Haig's) proposed policy toward China, strong and unfavorable political repercussions would be evoked."

Unexpectedly, the current U.S. administration still regards a cicada's wings as heavy and regards something that weighs 1,000 jun [jun is an ancient unit of weight; equal to 30 jin] as light; earthenware pots are making a lot of noise instead of the classical bells. The administration ignores the hardships and cries of hundreds of million of people on the mainland who are kept in slavery, and overlooks their longing for a free life. In fact, the administration has yielded to a few people in power in Peiping who are willfully making trouble, and has also accepted the improper claims made by these few people. The administration has not only ignored the propositions put forward by the majority of the American people and by people dedicated to a just cause, but has continued yielding to the appeasers' proposal for opposing the ROC and fawning on the CPC and has succumbed to the CPC blackmail.

Therefore, the issuance of the so-called "joint communique" will increase the hardships of the mainland Chinese people and has already constituted an unfriendly act against the ROC. It will also produce adverse effects on the spirit of the founding of America and on President Reagan's ethics and image.

The so-called "joint communique" contains two major points: 1. The United States' arms sales to the ROC will not exceed, either in qualitative or in quantitative terms, the level of those supplied in recent years since the "establishment of diplomatic relations" between the United States and the CPC, that it will eventually terminate the arms sales and that it does not seek to carry out a "long-term policy" of arms sales to the ROC. However, the communique does not mention a cut-off date for U.S. arms sales to the ROC. 2. The CPC states that it will strive for the "reunification" of China through "peaceful" means.

This so-called "joint communique" is an under-the-table and scandalous deal.

First of all, the communique violates the ROC's sovereign position. The ROC is an independent sovereign state and Taiwan is a province under the Government of the ROC. The ROC does not have any relations with the CPC, and the CPC does not have any qualifications to interfere in the ROC and Taiwan. In order to promote Taiwan's security, to safeguard the existence and freedom of Taiwan Province's 18 million residents, and to promote security and peace in the western Pacific region, Taiwan has every right to rely on its own economic force to buy advanced modern arms from foreign countries which will be used to prevent Communist invasion and expansion, to stop the CPC forces from crossing the Taiwan Straits and to prevent the CPC forces from carrying out infiltration and subversive activities in other Asian countries and regions. The buying of such arms for defense is an independent sovereign state's own business; and U.S. arms sales to the ROC only concern the United States and the ROC. The third party is not allowed to interfere in U.S. arms sales to the ROC and there is no need for the third party's "assent."

At present, although formal diplomatic relations do not exist between the ROC and the United States, the Taiwan Relations Act which was put forward by the previous U.S. administration and adopted by the U.S. Congress contains stipulations regarding nongovernmental relations between the United States and Taiwan in the cultural, economic and trade fields. Moreover, according to the act, to promote Taiwan's security, the United States should sell and supply defensive weapons of good quality to Taiwan in accordance with Taiwan's actual needs. This act is a domestic law of the United States' and the CPC's endless barking at U.S. arms sales to the ROC and its demand on ending such arms sales are tantamount to asking the United States to abolish the act and to interfering in the internal affairs of the United States. If the Reagan administration unilaterally succumbs to the CPC's unreasonable demand, the Reagan administration is negating the U.S. law. Last month, 28 social organizations in the United States jointly issued a warning: "If the Reagan administration tries to limit arms sales to Taiwan through a joint statement with Peiping, that will constitute an unconstitutional act." This warning expressed the American people's view.

Now the CPC says that the "Taiwan issue" is the CPC's "internal affair." We should like to ask if any Taiwan residents would be willing to accept the rule of the CPC and if anyone agrees with the CPC's drivel. The fact is that the "mainland issue" is really an "internal affair" of the ROC. The ROC Government's slogan "Fight Against Communism and Rebuild China" shows its sovereignty over the mainland. Therefore, the so-called "peaceful reunification" and the so-called "nine-point proposal" can only expose the CPC's ambition for invading the ROC's Taiwan Province and for vainly attempting to deprive the 18 million residents of Taiwan and free overseas Chinese of their freedom, and can achieve no other results.

With regard to this U.S.-CPC "joint communique," the ROC's Ministry of Foreign Affairs has issued a solemn statement which comprises the following three major points: 1. The ROC will consider null and void any agreement reached between the CPC and the United States. 2. Putting a ceiling on both the quality and quantity of the arms to be sold to the ROC is in contravention of the letter and spirit of the Taiwan Relations Act. 3. The United States must not be deceived by the CPC's "peace trick" and must not reduce arms sales to the ROC as this will strengthen the CPC's ambition for invading Taiwan and for expansion.

This statement not only shows the firm stand of the ROC Government but also reflects the aspirations of people throughout China. We hope that the U.S. authorities will attach importance to the freedom and rights enjoyed by the Chinese and Asian peoples. The U.S. authorities must no longer succumb to the CPC blackmail.

TA KUNG PAO ON REUNIFICATION OF PRC, TAIWAN

[Special article by Chang Yi-chun: "For the Country's Unification and Sovereignty"]

[Text] A few days ago, when discussing article 30 of the draft constitution together with the 9-point proposal put forth by Marshal Ye Jianying, we held that the greatest change after Taiwan becomes a special administrative region would be the fluttering of the five-star red flag of the motherland.

In order to free the Taiwan authorities of apprehension, the Chinese mainland authorities have declared that they will not dispatch officials to Taiwan and will not interfere in Taiwan's internal affairs. If the Taiwan side is satisfied with its status quo and likes its present political, economic and social system, it may continue as it wishes and the Chinese mainland side does not demand any change. The Chinese mainland side will assist in any way that is beneficial to the stability and prosperity of society and the people's life in Taiwan.

In his proposal, Marshal Ye mentioned that if Taiwan suffers from financial difficulties, it is possible for the Chinese central authorities to advance subsidies to Taiwan as the Chinese mainland side sees fit. Some people said that Taiwan needs no subsidies from the Chinese mainland as it has scored remarkable economic achievements, with the amount of its foreign trade far exceeding that of the Chinese mainland. This is an extremely shortsighted view. Everyone knows that Taiwan's economy is colonial in nature, and the income from exporting Taiwanese goods constitutes more than 50 percent of its gross national product. Depending on foreigners and with a weak foundation, Taiwan's economy cannot stand any storms and waves. In recent years, due to economic recession in the Western countries, Taiwan's economy has been beset with crises. Laden with anxieties, economic officials openly admit they cannot find a way to deal with the situation. The Chinese mainland has a great market and abundant resources. After continuous readjustment, there has been rapid development in the mainland's industry, agriculture and other fields. It is quite natural for the Chinese mainland, as a country, to advance financial subsidies to a region when it encounters difficulties. Even if Taiwan has scored some economic achievements, there is no reason to be arrogant.

Hong Kong's economic development is by no means inferior to that of Taiwan. The supply of nonstaple foodstuffs, drinking water, and other industrial products for daily use to Hong Kong by the Chinese mainland benefits the industrial and commercial business in Hong Kong and alleviates the daily life burdens of the residents. In recent years, the tourism boom and the increase of Entrepot trade has produced a good impact on Hong Kong's economy. Along with the process of the four modernizations drive including the exploitation of the South China Sea oil field and the supply of energy, this good impact will become greater and greater. This ready-made case can be used as a reference. How can Taiwan not look forward to the future when considering such matters?

The Chinese mainland has shown much tolerance and accommodation to the Taiwan side. The CPC hopes for a third cooperation with the KMT and has no intention whatsoever of gaining advantage thereby. The cooperation between the two sides has nothing to do with "suffering losses" and "being duped." If there is anything in the way of help that the CPC looks to the Taiwan side for, it is no more than the national reunification and sovereign integrity through joint efforts, which has a direct bearing on national prestige. It is absolutely the public interest that is at stake, and no selfish party interests are involved.

We all remember that before the normalization of Sino-U.S. relations, China and the United States held tediously long talks, the subject of which was the safeguarding of sovereignty. It is up to the Chinese people on both sides of the Taiwan Strait to resolve the problem of Taiwan, and China will never promise anything to the United States. The current controversy over U.S. arms sales to Taiwan is still an issue. China brooks no interference in its internal affairs by foreign countries; this matter concerns national sovereignty, and is a major principle that cannot be bartered.

It is precisely on the issue of national unification and sovereign integrity that the Taiwan side is not open and aboveboard.

Recently, Liao Chengzhi personally wrote a letter to Chiang Ching-kuo. In his honest and cordial words, Liao sincerely hope that that Chiang would make a contribution to national reunification in his lifetime. However, the earnest words fell on deaf ears. The day before Chiang Ching-kuo received Liao Chengzhi's letter, he declared a rejection of peace talks while addressing personnel at the conference on national construction. He said "if we declare the slightest intention of entering into peace talks, the will of our army and people may possibly be shaken. This is something we must never try out." It was not anticipated that the Taiwan side would fear peace talks seeking national reunification to such an extent. We would like to ask why talks on national reunification and sovereignty would shake the will of the people in Taiwan? Does it not show that national sovereignty and reunification accords with the general trend and will of the people, and that what the Taiwan authorities fear is that they would not be able to control the internal situation after holding peace talks. As a matter of fact, such worries on the part of the Taiwan authorities are uncalled for. If the will of the people is inclined toward the integrity of national sovereignty and national reunification, and if the Taiwan authorities accomplish it by their efforts, that means their behavior would accord with the general trend and will of the people. By so doing, the Taiwan authorities will inconspicuously extricate themselves from their present predicament and in turn strengthen their position. This is a simple truth, and there is no reason for the Taiwan authorities to back into a tight corner and stick to the old path.

The Taiwan authorities, by rejecting peace talks, put themselves in an embarrassing position. Mr Chiang confessed that he was criticized for being an inflexible diehard who could not gain the sympathy of others. Because everyone is able to compare and distinguish the attitudes shown by both parties, the KMT and the CPC, the complications in this matter are clear at a glance. One side is reasonable, not harsh, and takes the whole situation into account; the other side just looks around and tries to evade the issue, intentionally asks an exorbitant price, and publicly urges the mainland to abandon the four basic principles and to institute the Taiwan Constitution. It seems that the mainland has suffered defeat and is forced to surrender to Taiwan. It really regards national affairs as a trifling matter.

Today, the Taiwan authorities pin their hopes on foreigners, regard some American diehard congressmen as liberators, and trumpet that "cooperative relations between Taiwan and the United States will be to their mutual advantage and the separation of relations between them will be to their disadvantage." At the same time, they are not sure of the United States and threaten to adopt a "pluralized foreign policy." In short, they are obstinately seeking foreign backstage supporters, and do not want to attach themselves to the motherland.

The Taiwan authorities have fallen into a passive and self-contradictory position. This is due to the fact that they dare not publicly oppose the reunification and sovereignty of the country and do not want to face the facts and accept the most workable plan.

By sovereignty and reunification, ordinary people think this means the acceptance of direct control by the CPC and are afraid that the status quo cannot be maintained. Even some people outside Taiwan abstractly recognize and agree to national reunification and sovereignty, but specifically deny it. This is unworkable. Under the prerequisite of the reunification and defense of the sovereign integrity of the motherland, people may have an alternative as to what system is to be implemented and what kind of life they are going to lead. The present draft constitution allows for the establishment of special administrative regions and for the system of these regions to be stipulated by law according to specific conditions. Referring to the nine-point proposal put forward by Marshal Ye and the numerous declarations of Beijing, people in such a special administrative region are allowed to go for any alternative. This is the internal affair of the Chinese people, after all. Everything can be settled well through consultation, but how can one talk about sovereignty and reunification if the five-star Red Flag is not allowed to be hoisted?

In summing up the 100 years of China's history prior to his lifetime, Dr. Sun Yat-sen pointed out: "What was our nation suffering from? Where did the misfortunes we suffered come from? They were caused by the big powers." Today, the continuation of Taiwan's separate status and other problems left over from history are all related to none other than the big powers. We hope that the Taiwan authorities will not be swayed by personal feelings, that they will conscientiously and seriously take reunification and sovereignty into consideration, duly make their contribution, render meritorious service to the nation and give some account to history.

CITIZENS' RIGHTS IN PRC CONSTITUTION VIEWED

["Article From Outside Contributor" column by Meng Hsi [5536 1585]: "Refuting the Queer Arguments for Deleting Article 34 of the PRC Draft Constitution"]

[Text] When people discuss the PRC draft constitution, they pay great attention to the stipulations regarding the rights of citizens. These stipulations can be found in chapter 2 which comprises 22 articles and deals with a rather wide range of rights of citizens. Some items in chapter two of the draft constitution cannot be found in foreign constitutions. Likewise, some items in foreign constitutions cannot be found in our draft constitution. Some stipulations in our draft constitution have been formulated to counter the phenomena of absolute lawlessness that emerged during the "Cultural Revolution." This shows that the draft constitution is suited to our national conditions and has its own characteristics. Its general spirit can be described as follows: All citizens are equal before the law, every citizen enjoys the fundamental freedom and rights prescribed by the constitution and the law, and at the same time has the duty to abide by the constitution and the law. These stipulations are perfect as compared with those stipulations in previous constitutions.

Although many people appreciate these stipulations, someone has written an unorthodox article, calling for deleting article 34 which stipulates freedom of speech, press, assembly, association, procession and demonstration. This person gave his "reason" as follows: Since people on the mainland do not enjoy such freedom, to write such freedom into the constitution just means writing "great hollow words" into the constitution.

Is this really true?

In discussing matters concerning new China, some people, either due to their misunderstanding or due to their ulterior motives, have always energetically pointed out the favorable or unfavorable aspects of matters on the basis of the 10-year "Cultural Revolution" and the existence of pernicious influence; have applied the standards of Western capitalist societies to measures socialist China; and have always described China as a country without a single redeeming feature. During the "Cultural Revolution," Lin Biao and the "gang of four" betrayed Marxism-Leninism, created great confusions and tried to seize power amid confusion, thus bringing about a great calamity to the country and the people. It is true that during this period, the freedom and rights of our citizens simply did not exist. Moreover, some large-scale political movements carried out prior to the "Cultural Revolution," such as the antirightist struggle, had gone too far and had harmed the freedom and rights of a number of people. However, after bringing order out of chaos and summing up previous experiences, the whole country is determined to promote socialist democracy, to carry out the socialist legal system, to have no more large-scale political movements, to prevent the recurrence of any calamities such as the "Cultural Revolution," and to guarantee the realization of the four modernizations. Some people still assert that the Chinese people will not have freedom and rights. Is this not a very subjective assertion?

Since the "Cultural Revolution," various democratic parties on the mainland have resumed their activities, recruited more members into their parties and carried out work on their own initiative. Mass organizations, such as all types of associations and institutes, have emerged. Even students' associations which had been inactive for a long time have become active. Proper assembly and association are not forbidden. If you regard old China's green gang [qing bang 7230 1620] and red gang [hong bang 4767 1620] as signs of freedom of assembly and association; if you regard the Western "people's temple" which lured people into committing suicide as a sign of freedom of assembly and association; if you regard the Western "people's temple" which lured people into committing suicide as a sign of freedom of assembly and association; if you regard the Western clubs which promote the exchange of wives and homosexuality as signs of freedom of assembly and association; and if you regard Hong Kong's decadent "associations" which can be seen everywhere here as signs of freedom of assembly and association, then I can tell you that such kind of freedom does not exist in today's China. In Western society, certain organizations sometimes strike up tunes that run counter to their government in order to offer a show of democracy and freedom. This kind of plaything also does not exist in China.

As to freedom of speech and press, we can see that China's publishing undertakings are increasingly flourishing. Achievements in collating and publishing ancient books and new creative works are obvious to all. All kinds of specialized books and journals have sprung up like mushrooms. The circulation of magazines for popular consumption has reached 1 million copies. The publication of literary and artistic works is not subject to censorship. Although some works have been criticized after being published, people can still express differing views. Academic, literary and artistic works always have been criticized and in all countries. Can the mainland's works be immune from criticism? Some organizations have set relatively strict demands on the contents and standards of works by writers who are party members. This is understandable. The mainland once criticized some works by a number of writers including Bai Hua. However, such criticism has been willfully played up by outside circles as if another "Cultural Revolution" will emerge. Is it not true that Bai Hua and others are currently living freely and writing creative works as usual?

At present, people on the mainland publicly discuss current affairs and criticize certain unhealthy tendencies in society. Their attitude toward current affairs and unhealthy tendencies is open and clear. Even overseas Chinese who have visited their relatives and friends on the mainland are deeply impressed with this attitude. At meetings held by units and organizations at all levels, participants can speak out freely. In view of the "Cultural Revolution's" wild practices, the "four freedoms" have been deleted from the constitution. However, written statements on personal opinions can still be put up at designated locations.

Moreover, members of all trades and professions can express their opinions in their own units; if necessary, they can also bypass their immediate leadership and present their appeals and complaints to higher levels. They not only can send their letters to newspapers to expose violations of the law and breaches of discipline but can even report such violations and breaches to the central discipline inspection commission. People can express any views at meetings of people's congresses and CPPCC committees. Many incisive views have been expressed at several recently held meetings of people's congresses and CPPCC committees. According to the draft constitution, deputies to the National People's Congress shall not be subjected to legal investigations for speeches at its meetings. The CPPCC Constitution has the same stipulation. All these things guarantee freedom of speech.

Procession and demonstration are not frequently held in China. There were many processions and demonstrations in the past to support just struggles waged by the peoples of various countries. The Chinese people are not docile lambs. When they are roused to righteous indignation, they will step forward bravely and pour into the streets; and no one can stop them. The "5 April" incident was a heroic protest demonstration which surfaced under the feudal fascist violence of the "gang of four." The broad masses of the Chinese people may be backward in certain aspects such as science and technology and legal knowledge, however, after being tempered in political movements over the past several dozen years, their political level is high. They know the development line of the country and understand the correct guiding principles and policies. They know whether they should hold processions and demonstrations to express their viewpoints and wishes regarding things concerned. Some outside circles present their arguments on the basis of Western standards. They think that democracy and freedom mean frequent processions and demonstrations held by the people to oppose this and that. In socialist China, the government and the people are not antagonistic to each other. Therefore, China regards such outside circles' interpretation of democracy and freedom as a misinterpretation.

In today's China, no one will be tried purely for his ideological beliefs and no one will be persecuted for being ideologically progressive, unlike those Americans who were persecuted and accused of opposing the United States just because they were ideologically progressive during the McCarthy era.

The constitution is the norm which people throughout the country should abide by. Every regime regards its constitution as a tool to safeguard its rule. As China is a country under the people's democratic dictatorship, its constitution and law are of course responsible to all the people in the country. This is the true state of affairs which cannot be changed by outside circles' attacks and slanders.

I think that the stipulations in the draft constitution are practical and realistic. For example, freedom of strike has been deleted. This is because our workers are the masters. Our workers can also participate in enterprise management. The Chinese situation is different from the Western situation in which labor and capital are antagonistic to each other. Therefore, it is correct to delete the article regarding freedom of strike. However, with regard to the assertion that the Chinese people do not enjoy freedom of speech, press, assembly and association and that Article 34 should be deleted, we can say that such an assertion does not conform with reality and is also groundless.

We absolutely do not think that the Chinese people enjoy enough freedom. It should be recognized that the freedom enjoyed by the Chinese people is far from sufficient. From now on, it is imperative to conscientiously promote the building of a democratic legal system and to safeguard this system.

In the past, China promulgated several constitutions which were all disrupted by political movements, thus disappointing people. However, formulating constitutions has never been smooth sailing in other countries, either. Following the French Revolution, there were restorations and relapses in the political situation in France, and the French Constitution was revised again and again. France's present Constitution is the country's 16th constitution. China has suffered setbacks in the formulation of its constitution. However, suffering such setbacks is not important. The important thing is to learn lessons and to continue making great efforts. We should not believe that the promulgation of a new constitution today means the country's full establishment of a democratic legal system tomorrow. Because China's feudal history lasted several thousand years and China's legal system was destroyed by the "Cultural Revolution" and other political movements of the same kind, the realization of a democratic system in China cannot help requiring a process.

The current revision of the constitution has summed up both our positive and negative experiences, implemented the line, guiding principles and policies of the party's third plenary session, decided on the party-government division, abolished the lifelong tenure system, implemented democratic centralism, eradicated the cult of personality, and disallowed reliance upon a person's words instead of the law. The whole nation deeply understands that we cannot vitalize the Chinese nation without realizing the four modernizations, and that we cannot guarantee the success of the promotion of the four modernizations without building a democratic legal system. The current revision of the constitution has been discussed by people throughout the country. From now on, with the perfection of the legal system and with the extensive spread of the sense of the law and legal knowledge, everyone will treasure and abide by the constitution, will conscientiously carry out supervision through one's deputy and other channels, and will regard the enforcement of the constitution as a struggle. Consequently, we can strive for the establishment of a democratic legal system and we have certainty of our success in the current formulation of the constitution.

SHIJIE JINGJI ON WORLD, CHINA'S ECONOMIES

HK171017 Beijing SHIJIE JINGJI in Chinese No 7, 10 Jul 82 pp 1-5

[Article by Qian Junrui [6929 0193 3843]: "The Outlook of the World Economy and the Chinese Economy in the 1980's" -- a thesis written for the international economic discussion conference jointly sponsored by the Chinese Institute of Social Sciences and the U.S. Brookings Institution and held 31 May-4 June 1982 in Beijing]

[Text] The Basic Structure of the World Economy at Present

World War II greatly weakened the foundation of imperialism. A group of new socialist countries were founded. As a result, there existed from the early postwar period to the mid-1950's two camps in the world, namely the capitalist camp and the socialist camp. At the same time, many colonial and semicolonial countries have successively declared independence and a vast number of newly developing countries have emerged.

Since the mid-1950's, the Soviet Union, the first socialist country in the world, has gradually degenerated into a social-imperialist country. Its leading group has willfully carried out foreign expansionism and invasion and practiced hegemonism. China and other socialist countries have, however, adhered to the socialist road and practiced proletarian internationalism. As a result, the socialist camp has broken up and no longer exists.

Thus, the world economy has gradually changed from the antagonistic situation between the capitalist group and the socialist group during the early post-World War II period to the mutually dependent and mutually conflicting structure between the four parts of the world, namely, the capital imperialist countries, social imperialist countries, socialist countries and the developing countries. What we face at present is such a structure.

I would like to give below a brief introduction to the basic situation concerning these four parts.

1. Capital imperialist countries (the developed capitalist countries in the West). After experiencing a recovery in the late 1940's, these countries have generally strengthened state interference in the economy. As a result of the impact of the third scientific and technical revolution and the utilization of cheap petroleum, these countries entered into a "golden age" of rapid growth in the 1950's and the 1960's. Since the 1970's, because of the increasing sharpening of the contradictions inherent in the capitalist system and the sharp rise in petroleum prices, the Western countries have been landed in a predicament marked by alternate economic crises and "staglflation."

1. Stagnation or even decreases in production (the economic growth rate has decreased from 6.9 percent in the 1960's to 3.4 percent in the 1970's), serious inflation and unemployment have become chronic maladies which are hard to cure. At present, however, the economies of the Western countries still hold a predominant position among the economies of the whole world.

2. Socialist countries. Since World War II, China and many other countries have proceeded along the socialist road following the Soviet Union. Since the mid-1950's, the Soviet Union has gradually degenerated into a social-imperialist country, but China, the Democratic People's Republic of Korea, Romania and Yugoslavia have adhered to the socialist road. Socialism is naturally where the hope of mankind lies. In the early period of construction, the socialist countries copied the Soviet pattern and practised an over-concentrated management system in the economy. They overemphasized administrative management methods and neglected economic methods and regulation by market regulation, and thus suffered setbacks in economic development. Subsequently, they have successively conducted reforms in the economic system and scored achievements to different degrees.

3. Soviet social imperialism and some East European, Asian, African and Latin American countries under its control. The Soviet social imperialists, by exploiting the tremendous material and technical strength accumulated in the Lenin-Stalin period and the abundant natural resource of the Soviet Union, and with the development of military supplies playing a leading role, have rapidly developed their national economy and steadily expanded their economic power. Under the signboards of "internationalism," "international division," "non-capitalist road," and "natural ally of the Third World," they are intensifying foreign expansion and invasion and fighting for world hegemony. They have not only controlled some East European countries, Cuba, Vietnam, Mongolia, and a handful of Asian, African and Latin American countries, but are also further carrying out economic, political and military infiltration and expansion in many developing countries. At present, this part holds second place among world economies at present, next to capital imperialist countries.

4. The developing countries, that is, the Third World. Comprising more than 120 countries, this part constitutes more than two-thirds of the world's territory and population. In accordance with different national conditions and different development directions since independence, they can be roughly divided into the following three types: 1) The developing socialist countries. Under the specific circumstances of historical development, some economically backward countries have achieved victory in socialist revolution. They have eliminated the capitalist system and taken a socialist road. The level of economic development in these countries is equal to that of the developing countries. Hence, they belong to the Third World and constitute only a minority in this part at present. 2) The developing nationalist countries. Since their independence, these countries have, under the leadership of the national bourgeoisie, fought against imperialism, colonialism and hegemonism and developed a national economy, thus greatly developing national capitalism. 3) Countries which have not been divorced from a colonial or semicolonialist status and which are dominated by the precapitalist mode of production. These countries also constitute a minority in this part. The above are the forms of different types of countries in the Third World. In addition, there are also differences between the developing countries in the patterns of national economic development. The development is uneven and the disparity between the rich and the poor is large. Although the situation is complicated and many internal contradictions exist in the countries of the Third World, the main and basic trend is uniting to fight in their struggle against imperialism, colonialism and hegemony. They are the mighty pillars and powerful bastions for the future development and prosperity of the world.

The Forecast and Outlook for the World Economy in the 1980's

First, I would like to talk about the problem of forecasting methods. At present, Western scholars have adopted many forecasting methods, such as the probability calculation method, the trend inference method, the de er fei [1795 1422 2431] method, the shifting average method, the relation method, the feedback method, and so on. All of them contain scientific elements, to different degrees, which we can use for reference. However, we hold that economic development is determined by objective laws. Therefore, when taking a look at the world economic situation and making forecasts, we must mainly base them on some important economic laws and make analysis and judgment according to the present reality. When taking a look at the situation of the world economy in the 1980's and making forecasts, we must first of all take into consideration the following economic laws and factors which may produce great impact on the development of the world economy, and then use the scientific element in the above methods as the instrument for calculation and forecasting.

1. The law of the capitalist reproduction cycle and its deformation. Since World War II, as a result of state interference in economic life and the new characteristics brought about by the replacement of fixed assets, there has appeared deformation, to some extent, of the capitalist reproduction cycle. Undoubtedly, this deformation will have a great impact on the development of the economy in the capitalist world. Therefore, when taking a look at the prospects of the economy in the capitalist world and making forecasts, we must have a full and correct understanding of this law and its deformation and pay special attention to the policies of various governments of interfering in the economy and their impact on the process of capitalist reproduction.

2. The law of uneven development of capitalism. The uneven development of politics and the economy is the absolute law of capitalism. Since the war, due to the rapid development of science and technology and continuous improvement of business management, the function of this law in the capitalist world has been further strengthened. We must pay full attention to it when making forecasts on the situation of the world economy in the 1980's.

3. The social economic development laws. For quite a long time, due to the defects in the business management system, there have been impediments, to a certain extent, to bringing into full play the role of the social economic development laws (such as the basic law of socialist economy, the law of planned and proportional development, the law of distribution according to work, the law of commodity production and value under socialism and so on). Nevertheless, along with the carrying out of economic reforms in various socialist countries, the role of these laws will be strengthened and they will further stimulate economic development in socialist countries.

4. The hegemonist policies of Soviet social-imperialism and its impact on economic development. The Soviet Union is also conducting economic reforms. But the reforms and other economic measures are all for the purpose of its invasion and foreign expansion as well as for fighting for world hege[illegible] Therefore, when looking at the prospects of the trend of its economic development, we must take into full consideration the hegemonist policies of the Soviet Union and their impact on economic development, particularly the characteristic of the military nature of its national economy.

5. The law of economic development pushed forward by scientific and technical development. Since World War II, scientific and technical development has played an important role in the development of the world economy.

At present, although the peak of the third scientific and technical revolution has passed its impact on the economy should in no way be understimated. When looking at prospects for the future development of the world economy, we must take into consideration the scientific and technical development and the possibility of its making a great breakthrough.

6. The law of the dialectical relationship between politics and economy. The economy determines politics and it reacts to politics as well. When estimating the trend of the development of the world economy, we must pay attention to the development of the political situation in the whole world, and particularly pay attention to the problem of war and peace and to the policies implemented by the governments of various countries (several superpowers in particular). It has been reckoned by some people in the West that a world war will break out in the mid-1980's by reason of Soviet supremacy over the United States at that time. We must seriously study this possibility. As for local wars, they will be continuous. We must pay attention to studying their impact on the world economy.

In the final analysis, we hold that it is necessary to look at the prospects of the world economy and make forecasts in accordance with the above-mentioned objective laws which have a role in the process of economic development. With this view in mind, we hold that there will be the following tendencies in the development of the world economy in the 1980's:

First, let us look at the developed capitalist countries in the West. After experiencing the world economic crisis of 1973-75 and the subsequent "stagflation," these countries have once again suffered economic crisis since 1979, when the United States was first hit. In order to cope with crisis and eliminate stagflation, the Reagan administration has adopted the measures of the "supply theory" school, while Mrs Thatcher's Conservative Party government has adopted the monetary policy, all for the purpose of implementing liberal economic policies, stimulating investment, promoting production and halting inflation. France's Mitterrand government has practiced liberalization in name, but the doctrine of Keynes in reality. It has public welfare measures and stresses solving the problem of unemployment. These policies can achieve certain results within a definite time, but cannot cure the chronic malady of stagflation and crisis.

The Reagan administration itself has admitted the sharp downturn in the U.S. economy, which is well described by people as "Reagan recession" and large financial deficits. There is record unemployment with a rate unmatched since World War II. Reduction of taxes has not stimulated investment and production, and large deficits will definitely intensify inflation. All the Western European countries have gotten bogged down in economic crises and depression, while Japan is beset with difficulties. It is probable that stagflation and crisis will continue to be the main trend of economic development in Western countries. Generally speaking, these countries will maintain a low growth rate (say a 1-3 percent growth rate annually). Of course, when there appears the situation of a breakthrough in science and technology, energy substitutes or local war, the growth rate may be higher. But if there is any great change in the fields of energy sources or finance, economic crisis may appear once again. Furthermore, if a world war breaks out in the mid-1980's, (the possibility of such a war is small, as the people all over the world, including those of the superpowers, fear and strongly oppose nuclear wars) great changes and even fundamental changes will take place in the development of the world economy.

Three centers were established in the 1960's and 1970's, namely, the United States of America, Western Europe and Japan. Along with the increasingly sharp competition in world markets and the countinuous development of innovation in science and technology, this uneven situation will be further strengthened in the 1980's, with the United States, Western Europe and Japan creating a conspicuous situation of tripartite confrontation.

Although the socialist countries, such as China, the Democratic People's Republic of Korea, Romania and Yugoslavia, have encountered some difficulties, they will continuously march forward along the road of economic reforms in the 1980's. Generally, the growth rate of these countries will be higher than that of the Western countries and there will be a further improvement in the living standard of the people.

In the 1980's, Soviet social imperialism and some Eastern European countries will continuously conduct economic reforms, and slow the growth rate, but maintain sustained growth. It is estimated by the Western countries that the growth rate of these countries' economy will be about 2.5 to 4.7 percent in the 1980's. The inflation rate was generally 1 to 3 percent in 1980 and it will continue to go up in the 1980's. With a continuously increasing proportion of the economy oriented to the military, it is difficult for the Soviet Union to vigorously develop agriculture and light industry. However, the exploitation of natural resources in the eastern part of the Soviet Union and its intensive economy will achieve returns in the 1980's. To put it briefly, the economic differences between the Soviet Union and the United States will be further decreased. As for those Eastern European countries under Soviet control, they will meet more serious economic difficulties in the 1980's and the people's grievances will intensify.

It is estimated that the average growth rate of the developing countries will be higher than that of the developed capitalist countries in the West, the Soviet Union and the Eastern European countries in the early 1980's, but their development will be uneven. Some oil-producing and newly industrialized countries may well reach an annual growth rate of 6 to 7 percent, whereas the South Asian and some African countries will only be able to reach 3 percent, or even lower. As a result of suffering heavy debt, unstable political situations and crises shifted by the Western countries, most developing countries will be plunged into more serious economic difficulties in the 1980's.

At present, the contradiction between superpowers and the Third World is becoming sharper. Due to the U.S. boycott and the Soviet sabotage, "North-South dialogue" has met with many difficulties. Meanwhile, the superpowers have sown discord and created splits to increase North-South contradictions. All these have created difficulties in the struggle for the establishment of a new international economic order by the Third World. However, we must realize that at a time when the developed capitalist countries are further depending on the developing countries, the expanding difference between the rich and the poor in the world will benefit neither the economic growth of the developing countries nor the stability and development of the developed countries' economy. This has been realized by more and more people. In addition, the establishment and development of regional cooperative organizations by the developing countries greatly benefits their upholding the principle of collective self-reliance and the strengthening of mutual cooperation. All these benefit the carrying out of "North-South dialogue" and will make the Third World achieve new victories in its struggle for the establishment of a new international economic order. Generally speaking, the world economy is developing toward a trend beneficial to the socialist countries and the vast number of developing countries. This is a definite trend which could change.

3. The Outlook for China's Economy in the 1980's

Since the Chinese Government put forward the policy of "readjusting, restructuring, reorganizing and upgrading" the national economy, there has been a favorable change in our country's economic situation. Compared with 1979, 1980 saw a growth rate of 7.2 percent in the total output value of industrial and agricultural production, of which the growth rate in the total output value of industrial production was 8.7 percent. In 1981, as a result of further implementation of the readjustment policy, there appeared in China a basic balance of revenue and expenditure, a trend of stable market prices, a continuous bumper harvest in agriculture, a comparatively large increase in the production of light industry, a striking change in the proportionate rate of distribution of the national income and a continuous upgrading of the living standards of the people.

Compared with 1978, the actual purchasing power of the residents in cities and countryside had increased 43 percent by 1981. All these have shown that we have scored remarkable achievements in readjusting the economy.

Practice has shown the readjustment of China's economy is an extremely comprehensive one and readjustment must be integrated with restructuring, reorganizing and upgrading. An overall restructuring of the economic system requires more time. Therefore, in the early 1980's, China will continue to implement the policy of "readjusting, restructuring, reorganizing and upgrading," and conduct an overall reorganization and necessary restructuring of the enterprises, centering on readjustment. In the late 1980's stress should be gradually laid on restructuring and upgrading so as to bring into full play the role of socialist economic laws, raise economic returns and develop the national economy at a higher speed.

The Chinese Government has made a decision that China must, proceeding from the practical situation of our country, take a new road of practical speed, better economic returns and more material benefit to the people. The main problem at present is the overemphasis on output value and neglect of economic returns. Therefore, we must seek unity of speed and returns. Because of the hard task of readjusting and restructuring and the fact that the basic components such as energy and transportation are still under reform and construction, it is impossible for China to develop its economy at a very fast speed in the early 1980's. It is estimated that the average growth rate will be 4 to 5 percent annually. In the late 1980's, however, the growth rate of the economy may well reach 5 to 6 percent, or even higher. Moreover, we are correcting the past wrongdoing of laying one-sided stress on the development of heavy industry so as to gradually accelerate the development of agriculture and light industry and make heavy industry serve agriculture and light industry. Also, we must produce more durable consumer goods to directly serve the people's life. We must change the previous actions of high accumulation and low consumption by reducing the previous accumulation rate of over 30 percent to about 25 percent.

To put it briefly, our central task in the 1980's will be the serious implementation of "readjusting, restructuring, reorganizing and upgrading" the economy. Through strenuous efforts in these 10 years, we will lay a good foundation for the rapid and healthy growth in the next 10 years so as to make the comprehensive target of our country's economy the reaching of a "comparatively well-off" level.

In accordance with the guiding principle of relying mainly on our own efforts while making external assistance subsidiary, China is implementing an open policy of vigorously developing economic relations with foreign countries. At present, China has already established economic and trading relations with 174 countries and regions. It is anticipated that in the 1980's, the economic and trading exchanges between China and other countries will develop vigorously both in breadth and in depth. China will double and redouble the number of economic and trading transactions with some countries and in some categories.

In developing its foreign economic relations, China will, in accordance with the principle of internationalism, first of all strengthen its economic collaboration and cooperation with various socialist countries and the countries of the Third World so as to benefically stimulate the common economic prosperity. This is the prime issue for China in developing its economic exchanges with foreign countries.

As for those developed capitalist countries, we must develop our trading and economic exchange with them on the basis of equality and mutual benefit and import funds and advanced technology from these countries. In the utilization of foreign capital, we must, in accordance with practical requirements and possibility, uphold the guiding principle of effective utilization and smooth progress; the concrete froms of this include the joint venture with Chinese and foreign capital, compensation trade and processing material provided by foreign countries.

In importing advanced technology, we must, proceeding from China's present foundation and capability to absorb, lay stress on importing middle-level and applicable technology, but at the same time lose no chance to import some necessary technology of a most advanced level. In importing technology, we must not give priority to importing full sets of equipment but should give priority to importing key equipment, patents and software.

As for the Soviet Union and the East European countries, we will also establish and develop normal economic and trading relations with them.

In short, along with the upgrading of scientific and technical standards and the development of productivity in the 1980's, China will continuously advance toward international prefessionalism and collaboration and join the modern ranks of international division of work. On the basis of increasingly strengthening economic power, there will be greater and greater potential for developing China's economic and trading relations with foreign countries and the road will become broader. In turn, the development of economic and trading relations with foreign countries will further promote China's socialist construction for modernization. This benignant circle accomplished on an ever-increasing scale is beneficial to strengthening world peace, expanding the world economy and establishing a new international economic order.

NEPALESE PRIME MINISTER FETES SFRY'S VLAJKOVIC

[Text] Kathmandu, August 19 (XINHUA) -- The Non-Aligned Movement, which made great strides in the last two decades, has now emerged a powerful force in favour of world peace, cooperation and justice, said Nepalese Prime Minister Surya Bahadur Thapa here yesterday. He was proposing a toast at a dinner given by him in honour of Radovan Vlajkovic, member of the Presidency of the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, according to the RISING NEPAL today.

He said the movement has faced "many challenges from within and without. Problems such as Afghanistan, Kampuchea and the Iran-Iraq war are continuing to elude peaceful solution and recently the Lebanese people have fallen victim to a distinctive war."

"The theatres of conflicts and struggles are now located in the Third World countries, the overwhelming majority of which belongs to the non-aligned family." The prime minister continued: "Such a world situation calls for greater dynamism, sense of purpose and unity among the non-aligned countries."

He stressed that Nepal's belief in the cause of peace was reflected in its peace-zone proposal which was the true application of the philosophy of non-alignment in its national outlook.

In his reply speech, Vlajkovic appreciated the role of Nepal in the Non-Aligned Movement and the efforts exerted by Nepal towards strengthening peace, stability and cooperation in South Asia.

Vlajkovic emphasized the importance of the upcoming seventh summit conference of non-aligned countries "in the present aggravated international conditions," and said the summit "can and should contribute to the surmounting of the crisis besetting the international community."

Referring [to] the situation in the Middle East, Vlajkovic said a lasting solution could be reached only by "an unconditional withdrawal of Israel from all the occupied territories, the inclusion of the PLO (Palestine Liberation Organization) as the sole and legitimate representative of the Palestinian people in the process of solving the crisis, and respect for the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people including the right to their own state.

He held that the solution of the problems of Afghanistan and Kampuchea should be based on the resolutions of the United Nations and the decisions of the movement of non-aligned countries.

Thapa and Vlajkovic exchanged views in their talks yesterday afternoon on bilateral, regional and global issues. Vlajkovic arrived here yesterday on an official visit to Nepal.

CONGRESSMEN PRAISE JOINT COMMUNIQUE WITH PRC

OW191624 Beijing XINHUA in English 1608 GMT 19 Aug 82

[Text] Washington, August 18 (XINHUA) -- Most of the U.S. House Foreign Affairs Committee members expressed approval of the China-U.S. joint communique when Assistant Secretary of State John Holdridge made a testimony on the issue before the committee today. Stephen Solarz, chairman of the Asian subcommitte, said that the communique "has avoided what had been a severe crisis in our relationship with the P.R.C. (People's Republic of China)." "This is a communique which wasn't easy to produce," he noted.

Jonathan Bingham, Democrat-New York, said the communique "was a great relief" to him because he was afraid that the United States was "paddling in what appears to me to be an unnecessary situation damaging to our own interests and not really serving any purpose." He described China's attitude as "very pragmatic", adding that he really did not see any reason "for us to get ourselves in a situation where our good relations with the PRC were threatened."

He also said that he did not see any trouble in the Sino-U.S. relations "until we manufacture this trouble." He continued to say that "the one situation that could cause real trouble in our relation with the PRC would be for us to do anything to challenge the idea that Taiwan is part of China."

"If we were ever to move in the direction saying that the Taiwanese are entitled to self-determination, on their own, that would be very dangerous," he warned.

In their speeches at the hearing, Lee Hamilton, Jim Leach, Robert Lagomarsino and Arlen Erdahl indicated their appreciation of the administration's success in concluding the joint communique with China. The only exception was the chairman of the committee, Clement Zablocki, who was deeply dubious of the communique and asked a number of questions out of his doubts.

U.S. NUCLEAR WAR PLAN AGAINST USSR FORMULATED

[Text] Beijing, August 17 (XINHUA) -- The U.S. Defence Department has formulated a strategic plan that contemplates to fight and win a nuclear war with the Soviet Union that could go on for half a year, according to a report in the Los Angeles TIMES Sunday. Quoting administration officials, the report said the plan was drawn up in response to a directive from President Reagan given after a top secret National Security Council meeting last autumn on U.S.-Soviet relations. The plan, presented to the National Security Council last week by the Defence Department, was now waiting final approval from President Reagan, the report said.

The report said 18 billion dollars have been devoted to build a communications system that could ensure the U.S. the capability to win a six-month long nuclear war with the Soviet Union.

The New York TIMES carried on August 10 an interview with Defence Secretary Caspar Weinberger in which he also disclosed that the U.S. has a five-year plan on preparations for a protracted nuclear war with Moscow. The U.S. armed forces, Weinberger said, "are directed to maintain under all circumstances nuclear offensive capabilities" and "must prevail even under the conditions of prolonged war".

WAN LI MEETS WITH JAPANESE BUNRAKU TROUPE

[Text] Beijing, August 18 (XINHUA) -- Chinese Vice-Premier Wan Li met here today with Isamu Saheki, head of the Japanese Bunraku (puppet drama) troupe and director of the Japanese Bunraku Association, and principal members of the troupe. The vice-premier said this contributes to the friendship between Japan and China. He said the friendship between the two peoples will continue to develop for safeguarding peace and stability in Asia.

Saheki said the cultural and economic exchanges between the two countries have developed greatly in the past 10 years since the normalization of diplomatic relations between Japan and China. The Japanese people will continue their efforts to develop the friendship between the two countries, he said. JAPANESE LDP MEMBERS DISCUSS TEXTBOOK REVISION

[Text] Tokyo, August 19 (XINHUA) -- A joint meeting of chairmen and vice-chairmen of the Japanese ruling Liberal Democratic Party's [LDP] foreign affairs research council and foreign affairs committee here this morning discussed the problem of textbook revision, according to press reports here today.

The director general of the Public Information and Cultural Affairs Bureau of the Japanese Foreign Ministry, Hashimoto, said the screening of revised textbooks is of course Japan's internal affair. However, it is natural for the countries and regions including China, where millions or tens of millions of people were slaughtered by the Japanese aggressor troops, to voice their protest against the revision of textbooks because of the distortion in the course of revision.

Dietman Ryoichi Nagata pointed out that the rising sentiments against Japan in the ASEAN countries and close neighbouring countries would affect the future prosperity of Japan. Dietman Keiwa Ikuda held that with regard to corrections emphasis should be placed on diplomatic relations so as to prevent Japan from becoming an orphan in Asia.

However, Dietman Shizuka Kamei said that the demand from abroad (including China) for correction of the revised textbooks constituted interference in Japan's domestic affairs, and Masayuki Fujio, former member of "Seirankai" (Blue Storm Society), said that the Japanese Government should not compromise on the matter.

JAPANESE WAR CRIMES, MILITARISM DENOUNCED

CHINA DAILY 20 Aug Article

HK200302 Beijing CHINA DAILY in English 20 Aug p 4

["Opinion" column "from an article by HONGQI commentator: "A Danger Signal of a Resurgence of Japan's Militarism"]

[Text] The Japanese Ministry of Education has tried to absolve the militarists from the guilt of aggression by distorting history through censorship of textbooks. And up to now, there is a flood of indignation and protest swelling among the Chinese, Korean and other east and Southeast Asian nations.

The Chinese Ministry of Foreign affairs approached the Japanese Government, solemnly demanding that they take the responsibility of correcting the mistakes made by the Japanese Education Ministry. Indignation has been growing around the world, including among the just people of Japan.

As has been pointed out by many commentaries, this is not simply a dispute over words. Nor is it an accident. It is a grave signal showing that Japanese militarism is trying to revive.

For nearly half a century, the Chinese people struggled against the Japanese invaders, especially heroically during the 1930's and 1940's under the leadership of the Chinese Communist Party. They contributed a magnificent chapter to the history of national liberation movements of the world.

In modern Chinese history, it was the goal and common desire of millions of Chinese at home and abroad to liberate the nation from the oppression of imperialist Japan and other imperialist powers.

A Verdict

It has long been a verdict of history that Japanese militarism committed soaring crimes by its aggression against the Chinese, Korean and other east and Southeast Asian peoples.

But now, besides the Japanese Ministry of Education, some other high-ranking Japanese officials have come forth to support a distortion of history in Japanese textbooks. Among them is Yukiyasu Matsuno, Japan's National Land Agency head, who even argued that when Japan "advanced" into foreign countries, it did not call its actions aggression, and that to present "advance" as aggression is a distortion of history. Such logic does not acknowledge any aggressive war or aggressor in all of history, and actually demands a reversal not only of the history of Japan's aggression against China, but also of the whole history of World War II.

A nation's attitude towards its past decides it future. It is necessary to draw upon the experience of the old generation's errors in order not to repeat them. The human race should not forget history, but rather should respect it. To whitewash past aggression against other nations means that some day Japan would probably retrace the old footpath of militarism. This danger already looms in today's Japan.

The remnants of the defeated Japanese militarists harbor the wish to stage a comeback. They have not yet succeeded only because of the resolute resistance of the Japanese people and strong opposition of the peoples in other Asian countries. It merits special attention that militarists have not been stamped out in Japan. Such people are by no means rare. They are doing all sorts of things to revive militarism, to turn Japan from an economic power into a military one in order to relive the old dream of "the Greater East Asia Coprosperity Sphere". The recent Japanese film "Dai Nippon Teikoku" ["Great Japanese Empire") wantonly glorifies the war criminal Hideki Tojo and propagates the notion that the launching of aggressive wars was for the protection of Japan and the "liberation of Asia". According to the Japanese newspaper NIHON KEIZAI SHIMBUN, the purpose of the film was "to restore a historical view of east Asian warfare that is favourable to the Japanese." The recent textbook censorship is an important manifestation of this same political trend to restoring militarism.

The Second World War brought unprecedented disaster to the whole of human kind. The most important lesson of the war was: An appeasement policy towards aggressors does not curb the danger of a world war.

Today, in the world arena, the balance of the forces of peace and the forces of war has undergone great changes. But the danger of war still exists. A common urgent task facing the people of the world and all of the peace-loving countries is, at present, to curb any factor that might lead to a new world war, making it impossible to breed or increase.

EXTORTION

The eight years of Japanese aggressive war against China (1937-1945) caused more than 10 million deaths and $50 billion in losses to China. Japan has become an economic power. Wasn't a considerable part of its capital and wealth plundered during its aggressive war and colonial rule over other countries?

During the 1894 Sino-Japanese war alone, Japan extorted the equivalent of what was then 350 million Japanese yen from China. It is even harder to estimate the wealth Japan later looted from China, Korea and other Asian nations (including wealth created by laborers from these countries) for the development of Japan's imperial economy. But, because of the friendship between the Chinese and Japanese peoples, the Chinese people do not demand that the present Japanese Government be held responsible for the war. They even gave up claiming indemnity from the Japanese Government.

However, the Chinese and other Asian peoples have the right to demand that the present-day Japanese Government take on the political and moral responsibility to stop the Japanese right wing's attempt to restore militarism, and to tell the truth to the Japanese younger generations so that they will never allow Japan to become a militaristic and aggressive power again.

Some in the Japanese Government have gone back on this responsibility. It must be pointed out that to distort the history of Japanese aggression against China is in essence an extreme insult to the Chinese people. The Chinese Government approached the Japanese Government and demanded that it correct the error. This is the justifiable right of a humiliated people. But some high-ranking Japanese officials, on the contrary, tried to find fault with China by saying this is "interference in Japan's internal affairs." Their disregard for morality and justice has reached a level that is impervious to reason.

INTOLERABLE

The Japanese public from all walks of life has proved that this behaviour of the Japanese authorities' is also intolerable to them.

The joint statement at the signing of the treaty of peace and friendship between the People's Republic of China and Japan included the words "the Japanese side is keenly aware of Japan's responsibility for causing enormous damages in the past to the Chinese people through war and deeply reproaches itself."

This was the premise for the establishment and development of peaceful and friendly relations between the two countries. To reverse this premise is to destroy the basis of such relations. The Japanese Government should take its Ministry of Education's errors seriously and rectify them with actions in order to defend the basis of friendly relations between China and Japan.

[Text] The day 15 August marks the 37th anniversary of the defeat and unconditional surrender of the Japanese aggressors in World War II. Today, after 37 years, a review of the history of Japanese militarism from its embarking on a road of aggression to its ultimate defeat is of practical significance.

Beginning from the latter part of the 19th century, as Japan's economic and military strength grew, the ambitions of Japanese militarists kept swelling. They made subjugation of China and turning China into a Japanese colony Japan's national policy, and repeatedly launched savage aggression against China.

During World War II, dreaming of establishing a Greater East Asia Co-Prosperity Sphere, Japanese militarists launched a bloody war of aggression in China and the vast Southeast Asian region, causing untold suffering and grievous losses to the Chinese people and the Southeast Asian countries.

Those who blindly worship force and engage in aggression in the end are fated to defeat. This has been repeatedly borne out by history. Thirty-seven years ago, Japanese militarism was punished by history. The Chinese people's victory in the war of resistance against Japan, as Comrade Mao Zedong put it, was a wonder in the annals of war, a heroic feat of the Chinese nation, an earthshaking, great success.

The Chinese people's victory was hard-won. During the 8 years of the war of resistance against Japan, the Chinese people suffered great losses. The Chinese people have stated time and again that only a handful of Japanese militarists should be held responsible for Japan's aggression against China, and that the masses of the Japanese people, like the Chinese people, were also victims of the war of aggression.

In the long history of Sino-Japanese association that dates back more than 2,000 years, Japanese militarist aggression against China lasted just over half a century and was no more than small adverse current. The profound sentiments of friendship between the two peoples goes back to ancient times. The Japanese people have always been close friends with the Chinese people. Especially since the normalization of diplomatic relations between China and Japan in 1972, the friendly relations between the two peoples have developed at unprecedented speed.

However, we soberly see there are people in Japan who have not accepted the historical lesson but still harbor militarist ambitions. Recently, as the 10th anniversary of the establishment of diplomatic relations between China and Japan was drawing near, there has emerged in Japan an adverse current to revive militarism. The Japanese Education Ministry, in screening textbooks, has brazenly distorted history and prettified Japanese militarism. The film "Great Japanese Empire," which revives the soul of the archcriminal Hideki Tojo, has been publicly shown recently in Japan. Are these all accidental and isolated events? Certainly not. They are important signs of the attempt of a handful of Japanese right-wingers to revive Japanese militarism; and they must not be treated lightly.

Past experience, if not forgotten, is a guide to the future. The historical lesson of the great sufferings caused by Japanese militarism to the Chinese people, the people of Southeast Asian countries and the Japanese people must not be forgotten. Some people in Japan today vainly hope to return to the old road of militarism. Of course, the Chinese people and the people of the Southeast Asian countries will not tolerate this. Even the Japanese people, who have suffered greatly from militarism, will not let them do this. We believe that people of insight in the Japanese Government also will not allow a small number of people to push Japan back onto the same disastrous road of militarism.

China and Japan and the people of the two countries should remain friendly from generation to generation. This is in the common interests of the two peoples and is the irresistible historical trend. However, to promote Sino-Japanese friendship and cooperation, the Chinese and Japanese people must work together, and constantly guard against and promptly beat back any adverse current that attempts to revive Japanese militarism.

CHENGDU RIBAO 13 Aug Article

HK140249 Chengdu Sichuan Provincial Service in Mandarin 0030 GMT 13 Aug 82

[Summary] The 13 August CHENGDU RIBAO carries on page 4, under the heading "The Crimes of Japanese Militarism Cannot Be Erased," reports taken from old newspapers on the indiscriminate Japanese bombing of Chengdu. There is a report from the HUAXI RIBAO of 14 June 1939, entitled "6,000 Households Hit in Japanese Bombings." There are also reports from the [XINXING XINWEN] of 31 July 1941 and a report from HUAXI RIBAO of 7 August 1941.

CHENGDU RIBAO adds an editorial note to these reports. It says: "People are extremely angry at the move of the Japanese Education Ministry in tampering with the history of Japanese aggression against China and prettifying Japanese militarism. Japanese militarism brought tremendous calamity on the Chinese people by launching their war against China. That the people of northeast, north and east China directly suffered maltreatment by the aggressors goes without saying; even Sichuan, the great rear area, continually suffered air attacks. In these indiscriminate raids, countless people were killed in Chongqing, Zigong, Luzhou, Chengdu and other large and medium cities, and very serious damage was caused. Chengdu suffered numerous major raids. The attacks on 11 June 1939, 24 July 1940 and 27 July 1941 were described as great disasters by the newspapers at that time. We have reprinted some of their material. From these incomplete extracts, people can see the extent of Japanese crimes in aggression against China.

"Nobody can tamper with the history of Japanese militarism's aggression against China. The Japanese Education Ministy should abide by the principles of the Sino-Japanese joint statement, regard Sino-Japanese friendship as the most important thing, and restore the true historical facts in their primary and secondary school textbooks."

CORRECTIONS TO RENMIN RIBAO WAR FILM CRITICISM

The following corrections pertain to the item headlined "RENMIN RIBAO Criticizes Japanese War Film," published in the 19 August DAILY REPORT, page D 7:

Page D 7, penultimate paragraph, from line one, should read: "What particularly arouses the indignation of the Chinese film workers is that the makers of this film have also openly carried out the activities of "two Chinas." (adding indistinct words)

Page D 7, penultimate paragraph, from line five, should read: ...as revealed by the film-makers. This received "the overall support of the Taiwan military authorities." This also shows that there are still some people who are willing to create opinion for the revival of Japanese militarism and to serve "the great Japanese Empire." (adding indistinct words)

SRV TROOPS IN KAMPUCHEA SAID TO BE REINFORCED

OW191316 Beijing XINHUA in English 1216 GMT 19 Aug 82

[Text] Bangkok, August 19 (XINHUA) -- Vietnamese occupation troops in Kampuchea have recently been busy constructing logistic routes to the border area in western Kampuchea and moving fresh troop reinforcements into the area, Thai military sources disclosed.

The Vietnamese action is believed to be prompted by difficulties in maintaining a constant flow of supplies to their troops at the frontline and the intensified resistance of Kampuchean patriotic forces.

Major Gen Wanchai Ruangtrakn, chief-of-staff of the First Army Region, made an inspection tour of the Thai-Kampuchean border areas last week. He told the NATION REVIEW yesterday that the long logistic routes used by the Vietnamese to carry supples to the border areas had become vulnerable to attacks and harassments by Kampuchean resistance forces, particularly the Democratic Kampuchean forces. The attacks by the resistance forces had inflicted heavy casualties on the Vietnamese troops guarding the major logistic routes, he said.

He added that due to the logistic problems, the Vietnamese forces would predictably be incapable of mounting large-scale military offensive until early next year.

Field military sources in the border province of Prachin Buri reported that the Vietnamese were speeding up the building of new bunkers, particularly along Highway Five between Poipet and their military base at Ban Nimitr. They were also reportedly digging big tunnels and mounting antiaircraft artillery guns at the Poipet railway station and some other places in the town.

According to some reports, the Vietnamese had also moved to Highway Five new high-powered weapons including armored vehicles mounted with multi-barrelled rocket launchers. Fresh reinforcements had been pouring into the border areas.

In addition, the Vietnamese forces had started to push their people into new areas including Siem Reap and Kampong Cham in western Kampuchea.

Observers here believe that the construction of logistic routes and troop movements showed the Vietnamese are not going to withdraw from the Kampuchean-Thai border area. On the contrary, they are prepared for bigger operations there.

THAI SPOKESMAN ON DISGUISED SRV 'WITHDRAWAL'

OW191612 Beijing XINHUA in English 1534 GMT 19 Aug 82

[Text] Bangkok, August 19 (XINHUA) -- Senior Thai military spokesman Lt. General Som Kataphan said today that Vietnamese aggressor troops in Kampuchea had returned to the Thai-Kampuchean border and engaged in more fightings after a disguised "withdrawal." The Thai side has been highly alerted by the situation.

Speaking to reporters at a press conference here this morning, Som Kataphan, who is director of the Information Office of the Supreme Command of the Thai Armed Forces, said Vietnamese troops had "withdrawn" 50 kilometers from the Thai-Kampuchean border since the end of July. But they immediately moved toward Kampuchean border areas in Samrong District, Oddar Meanchey Province, Choam Khsan District, Preah Vihear Province, and Poipet District, Battambang Province.

Col Proksu Sutalanan, representative from the Thai Army, told the press conference that during the same period there were also Vietnamese troop movements along the Lao-Thai border. Large numbers of Vietnamese troops, along with arms and ammunition, had been moved to Houei Sai Province in Laos bordering on Thailand's Chiang Rai Province. Vietnam also deployed more tanks in Sayaboury Province of Laos opposite Thailand's Utteradit Province.

Pratsan Chuchinda, representative from the Thai Navy, said at the press conference that from July 29 to August 15, armed Vietnamese fishing vessels raided Thai fishing vessels in the southwest coastal waters of Thailand on several occasions. Four Thai fishing vessels were seized along with fishermen on board. Up to now, two of the fishing vessels and some of the fishermen had not been returned.

YUNNAN EFFORTS TO REPULSE SRV TROOPS RECALLED

[Text] Kunming, 19 Aug (XINHUA) -- Studying the communique of the 7th Plenary Session of the 11th CPC Central Committee in the past few days commanders and fighters stationed on the frontline of Yunnan's Koulin mountain are making great efforts to solidify their positions and keeping alert a hundredfold to defend the motherland in order to greet the triumphant convening of the 12th CPC National Congress with concrete deeds.

When the Central People's Broadcasting Station transmitted the communique of the seventh plenary session on the evening of 6 August, they attentively listened to and warmly discussed the communique in bunkers and pillboxes. Recalling that in the past year -- under the cordial concern of the party and the people -- they frustrated the Vietnamese troops' raids, harassments and provocations several hundred times and killed over 180 of them on Koulin mountain, these commanders and fighters are determined to continue their efforts to build the Koulin mountain into an iron and steel position against the enemy. The party brances of all companies have held branch meetings and made the decision to accelerate the construction of their positions. Commanders and fighters have already started their arduous work by challenging each other to do better work. Incessant rains turned roads muddy and in some cases washed out roads in the Koulin area. The commanders and fighters physically carried scores of dun of materials up to the top of the mountain. Whenever bunkers and pillboxes werw washed away, they repaired them in the rain. Many fighters even defied fatigue after posting guard and joined repair work.

Vietnamese troops have frequently launched provocative raids against the Koulin area since the beginning of August. In view of the enemy's aggressiveness, the commanders and fighters are alert a hundredfold, stengthening their guard and making all preparations against war. Platoon leader Chen Handong voluntarily observed the enemy activities on the front and led fighters in returning fire on the enemy intrusion. Accepting the mission of annihilating the intruding enemy, the 14th Company's commanders and fighters ambushed the enemy in the rain and eventually frustrated the enemy's plot, winning a victory.

CHINESE JOURNALIST RECALLS VISIT TO HUNGARY

[Article by Ji Ping [7871 1627]: "A Beautiful Country, Friendly People -- Impressions of a Visit to Hungary"]

[Text] In June of this year, on behalf of the China Journalists Association, I accepted an invitation from the Hungarian Journalists Association to spend 2 weeks in Hungary visiting and interviewing. Although my stay in Hungary was short, I left the country with unforgettable memories of Hungary's beautiful landscape and the kindness of the Hungarian people, especially the hospitality and friendship extended to me by the people of Hungary, the Hungarian journalists and labor unionists.

My visit brought me to the beautiful city of Budapest, with its shady tree-lined streets and parks blazing with color; boat races on the Danube River, spanned by new bridges of novel design, across which the traffic shuttled back and forth. Every sight I saw indelibly impressed itself on my mind. In addition, I paid visits to the industrially developed city of Gyor and the historically famous Sopron; I had ample time to take in the gorgeous scenery of Lake Balaton and the Huo-er-duo-ba-ji Plains [7202 1422 1122 1572 1142], and it was with great interest that I visited several factories and the famous Red Star Agricultural Production Cooperative. In addition I had the chance to meet with members of the Hungarian journalistic and labor unions. In our meetings we had friendly discussions on topics of interest to everyone. Everywhere I went I received a warm and cordial reception.

During my visit, what impressed me most deeply was that the development of friendship and bilateral understanding between our people really is the common goal of workers, journalists and the ordinary people of both our countries. Every Hungarian whom I met expressed genuine feelings of friendship toward the people of China. One elderly editor whom I met treated me like an old friend when we were introduced and chatted with me continually with great enthusiasm. Another elderly journalist recalled how he lived and worked in China during the 1950's and 1960's and expressed ardent, fond memories of China. Several of my Hungarian friends suggested that relations between journalists of Hungary and China should be increased and thereby lead to greater friendship and understanding between the two countries. Some Hungarians want to gain a greater understanding of China, and after hearing my brief outline of how China has overcome so many difficulties and succeeded in moving forward on a healthy road of development, many of these friends said with enthusiasm: I was very interested in your talk and hope that China will continue to become more and more propserous. When I spoke of the fact that China was still experiencing some difficulties and problems, but that the Chinese people had great trust and optimism for the future, my friends said: China's problems are of a temporary nature and as you move along the revolutionary road you travel, there is great hope for the future development of China. When one of my Hungarian friends heard me extend a welcome to him should he have the opportunity to visit China, he replied humorously: If God exists, I will pray. His response expressed his enthusiasm to visit China.

Another lasting impression I gained during my visit was how the Hungarian people, taking a realistic view of their country's situation, actively strove to build their country. I came to appreciate how, in the last 30 years, the Hungarian people have totally transformed their country from its former backwardness and poverty. The Red Star Agricultural Production Cooperative that I visited was one of the most advanced in the country and the last 10-20 years have seen speedy development in farming and animal husbandry. A great deal of the meat, poultry and eggs produced here are exported abroad. The meat-processing plant, built by the cooperative members themselves, is capable of processing over 30 different kinds of meat products and thereby supplying both the cooperative and nearby shops.

The woolen mill and refrigeration plant that I visited were both results of development out of smaller plants. Since the 1960's and 1970's and the introduction of greater autonomous decisionmaking in production and foreign trade, production development has been particularly rapid, and now production not only meets domestic demands but a certain proportion is also exported.

At the same time, heavy industry has also seen great expansion. The La Bao [2139 7637] car factory is a modern, large-scale factory, emoloying 20,000 workers. Last year, an average of $3,000 to $4,000 worth of foreign currency was earned for the country by each employee of the factory in production for export.

Economic development has created very favorable conditions, particularly in view of the well-deserved attention that argiculture and light industry have received, thereby raising standards of living and enriching the market. I visited several different kinds of markets and noticed the wide range of products available as well as the relatively high purchasing power of the people.

My Hungarian friends explained to me that in the last 30 years about 1.5 million living units have been built and that about half the population of the entire country now lives in new housing. Of course, some of my Hungarian friends pointed out with all honesty that many problems still exist in Hungary and in particular that the effect of the world economic recession on Hungary has been relatively great. They explained that during the struggle to overcome the present economic difficulties, they would use every means possible to prevent a drop in the living standards of the population. My Hungarian friends expressed optimism in achieving this goal.

Lebanese Prime Minister Shafiq al-Wazzan announced the Cabinet decision but gave no details. He hoped that the agreement would be the first step in implementing U.N. Security Council Resolutions 508 and 509.

Al-Wazzan said the Palestinian armed forces will start leaving Beirut as of August 21 or 22, and the evacuation operation is to be completed within 15 days.

The Lebanese Government has authorized Foreign Minister Fu'ad Butrus to ask the United States, France and Italy to join the multi-national peace-keeping force. A written request would be sent to the embassies of the three countries in Lebanon on the 19th.

Meanwhile, a Palestinian spokesman announced that the PLO had agreed to hand over to Lebanese Prime Minister al-Wazzan a captured Israeli pilot and the bodies of nine Israeli soldiers. But he said that he did not know where the four Israeli soldiers who died in 1978 were buried.

It is reported that the first group of evacuated Palestinians would include the sick and wounded. They would be sent first to Cyprus by the International Red Cross and then to other countries.

According to radio Israel, the Israeli Cabinet will have a special meeting at nine o'clock tomorrow morning to discuss the final agreement for solving the Beirut crisis handed to Israel by Habib this morning.

ISRAELI CABINET APPROVES FINAL SETTLEMENT DRAFT

OW191630 Beijing XINHUA in English 1613 GMT 19 Aug 82

[Text] Beirut, August 19 (XINHUA) -- A just-concluded Israeli Cabinet meeting approved the final draft of a document on the peaceful settlement of the Beirut crisis. Israeli radio reported that Israel was informed by the United States that the Palestinian Liberation Organization had agreed to release an Israeli soldier captured in the southern suburb of Beirut last night as well as an Israeli pilot captured by PLO guerrillas at the beginning of the Israeli invasion.

A Beirut newspaper today disclosed the details of the 17-point draft which includes cease-fire, the timing and where-abouts of the PLO's evacuation and the composition of the multinational force.

A Lebanese Government source said the question of the Syrian troops in west Beirut would be dealt with in the following way: The Palestine Liberation Army would withdraw to Syria immediately while the 85th Brigade would pull out from Beirut to join other Syrian forces.

The source pointed out that the settlement of the Beirut crisis was only the first step towards the withdrawal of all foreign forces from Lebanon. It would be followed by the withdrawal of Syrian and Palestinian troops from north Lebanon and Al-Biga and Israeli troops from Lebanon.

Lebanese Foreign Minister Fu'ad Butrus this morning summoned the ambassadors of the United States, France and Italy and handed to them his government's written request for the dispatch of a multi-national force.

UN RESOLUTION UPHOLDS PALESTINIAN RIGHTS

OW200346 Beijing XINHUA in English 0248 GMT 20 Aug 82

[Text] United Nations, August 19 (XINHUA) -- The U.N. General Assembly's seventh emergency special session, in a resolution today, calls for "the free exercise in Palestine of the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people to self-determination without external interference and to national independence."

The resolution, adopted with a vote of 120 in favour, two (Israel and the U.S.) against and with 20 abstentions, condemns Israel for its non-compliance with the Security Council's relevant resolutions and demands that Israel respect and carry out the provisions of the previous General Assembly resolutions relating to the occupied Palestinian and other Arab territories, including Jerusalem.

It reiterates the fundamental principle of the inadmissibility of the acquisition of territory by force and reaffirms its rejection of all policies and plans aiming at resettlement of the Palestinians outside their homeland.

The resolutions urges the U.N. secretary-general to undertake effective measures to guarantee the safety and security of the Palestinian and Lebanese civilian population in south Lebanon.

The document calls upon the secretary-general to initiate contacts with all the parties to the Arab-Israeli conflict in the Middle East, including the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO), with a view to convening an international conference, to find concrete ways and means of achieving a comprehensive, just and lasting solution.

Two more resolutions adopted today announce the Assembly's decision to convene an international conference on the question of Palestine in Paris in August 1983 and to commemorate 4 June of each year as the International Day of Innocent Children Victims of Aggression. On 4 June of this year, a great number of innocent Palestinian and Lebanese children became victims of Israel's aggression.

ELECTION OF DELEGATES TO 12TH CPC CONGRESS ENDS

[Text] Beijing, 20 Aug (XINHUA) -- Election of delegates and alternate delegates to the 12th National Congress of the Communist Party of China has been completed.

According to the resolution adopted by the 5th Plenary Session of the 11th CPC Central Committee in late February 1980 concerning the convocation of the 12th national party congress, the number of delegates elected to the congress should be 1,600 and the number of alternate delegates should be one-tenth the number of delegates. The work to elect delegates and alternate delegates to the congress, which covered a period of more than 2 years, was completed by the end of July 1982.

Party organizations at various levels attached great importance to the election of delegates to the 12th party congress. Party organizations of all provinces, municipalities, autonomous regions (including Taiwan Province), organs directly under the CPC Central Committee, central state organs and the various general departments of the PLA and its regional high commands held the election at their respective party congresses or conferences of representatives of party members. In the course of the election, they conscientiously observed the principle of democratic centralism and gave full expression to democracy. Candidates were chosen after full consultations and on the basis of the final opinion of the majority, and delegates and alternate delegates were elected by secret ballot in case the number of candidates was larger than the number of delegates elected, thereby better reflecting the voters' wishes. Some localities combined the work to elect delegates to the 12th party congress with the promotion of outstanding young and middle-aged cadres and, paying attention to seek talented people, elected outstanding young and middle-aged cadres with both political integrity and professional competence and in the prime of their life as delegates to the 12th party congress.

The overwhelming majority of the delegates and alternate delegates elected to the congress are outstanding persons from various regions, fields and nationalities who have enjoyed high prestige among, contributed to and maintained close contacts with the masses. Nearly two-fifths of the delegates are young and middle-aged party members. Women party members make up 14 percent. There are also many minority nationality party members, specialists and experts in various fields.

HU YAOBANG ON ROLE OF MIDDLE-AGED, YOUNG CADRES

OW190234 Beijing XINHUA Domestic Service in Chinsese 1421 GMT 18 Aug 82

[Text] Beijing, 18 Aug (XINHUA) -- Issue No 8 of the magazine LIAOWANG [OBSERVATION POST] to be published on 20 August will carry in its "Account of Events at Zhongnanhai" column a signed article entitled "One Should Make More Demands on Oneself at All Times -- Comrade Hu Yaobang's Ardent Expectations of Middle-Aged and Young Cadres." In their article, the co-writers Zeng Jianhui and Zhang Mengyi made a detailed account of a speech by Comrade Hu Yaobang to the graduates of the Central Party School's training class for middle-aged and young cadres at the conference hall of the western Zhongnanhai building on 20 July. The following are excerpts of the speech:

Comrade Hu Yaobang said: There are 142 middle-aged and young cadres present here today. So one question I particularly want to deal with today is our ardent expections of the middle-aged and young cadres.

Hu Yaobang went on to say: "The party has issued a clarion call, that is, we should care for, train and help all middle-aged and young cadres. We should do our best to support and promote those middle-aged and young cadres who have acquitted themselves well. This is a very pressing task now facing our party. This task has been approved by the party Central Committee, and we must carry it out with meticulous care. Comrade Xiaoping and Chen Yun have called for cadres to be revolutionized, knowledgeable, professional and younger. They also pointed out that whether or not there are prospects for the realization of the four modernizations depends on whether or not our cadres can become revolutionized, knowledgeable, professional and younger."

In order to systematically tackle this pressing, strategic task, the party Central Committee has adopted many concrete measures in this regard since its third plenary session. In accordance with the party Central Committee's decision, the Central Party School, in the second half of 1980, set up a training class especially for middle-aged and young cadres. Outstanding middle-aged and young cadres in leading positions on various fronts and in various parts of the country are selected by the Organization Department of the party Central Committee for study in the class for 1 year. More than 5,000 attended the first class. [Beijing RENMIN RIBAO in Chinese on 19 August publishes a virtually identical report on this speech. It gives the number attending the class as 500.] This graduating class is the second one. The graduates of 17 different nationalities come from some departments of the CPC Central Committee and the State Council and from the country's 29 provinces, municipalities and autonomous regions. Most of them are middle-aged and young cadres who have been promoted to leading positions at various levels in the past 1 or 2 years.

Hu Yaobang said to those present: Why should we now particularly stress the question of training middle-aged and young cadres? There are many reasons for this, but there are two main ones: The first is that there is still much to be desired in the cause of our country, the cause of socialism and communism, in spite of the tremendous achievements already made since the founding of the PRC, especially since the 3d Plenary Session of the 11th CPC Central Committee. The second is that a number of veteran party comrades will retire from the historical stage. The good health of these veteran revolutionaries and old Red Army fighters who are the mainstay of our country is a reliable guarantee for our cause. However, man is bound to become old and feeble and cannot resist the laws of nature.

"It is the above two subjective conditions [The RENMIN RIBAO account reads: "...above two objective conditions...." that make the whole party and the people of all nationalities throughout the country consider this question: how to select, train and promote thousands and thousands -- not just a few, nor hundreds -- of successors to our revolutionary cause. Then, who will these successors be? It goes without saying that these successors should be selected from among middle-aged cadres and then from among younger cadres." Here, Comrade Hu Yaobang stood up and said while pointing his fingers at those present: "I am not sure successors will be selected from among you 142 comrades. For you, there are no more than three possibilities: One possibility is that there are great prospects for most of you to assume more responsibilities for the people; another possibility is that some of you will shoulder heavier burdens for the people, while the rest will do a mediocre job; and the third possibility is that most of you do not have a great future. This has to be selected, appraised and accepted by the party and the people and be tested by history. There is no such thing as politeness in this regard."

Comrade Hu Yaobang said: "I have made these remarks simply to express my expectations on middle-aged and young cadres so that you will understand your heavy, historic responsibilities and do your best to fulfill them. Whether or not an individual can make a bigger contribution to the party and the people depends on his own endeavor."

Comrade Hu Yaobang said: No cause in the world can succeed without the greatest possible endeavor. He urged everyone to learn from the spirit of the women's volleyball team. He set six requirements for middle-aged and young cadres from a dialectical point of view:

THE FIRST REQUIREMENT: DO PEOPLE GOOD TURNS AND CORRECTLY HANDLE THE RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN OBJECTIVE CONDITIONS AND SUBJECTIVE EFFORTS. [Preceding and subsequent capitalized passages published in boldface] At no time should one complain about a bad environment or unfavorable conditions.

Rather, one should first consider if one has made a full endeavor. This of course does not mean that the environment or the conditions do not have any effects,but that one should not exaggerate them to an improper degree. A review of history shows that our CPC has hewed out its way under unfavorable conditions. If the environment and conditions are favorable, what are you needed for? China basically has the objective conditions to create an upswing in its economy. There are also the basic conditions for all comrades, including old, middle-aged and young cadres, to make tremendous contributions to the party. The key lies in their subjective efforts. One cannot say that one should be in a leading position in order to make a big contribution. Have many advanced persons not made tremendous contributions without being in a leading position?

THE SECOND REQUIREMENT: PUT ACHIEVEMENTS IN A CORRECT RELATIONSHIP TO ONE'S ENDEAVOR.
Any great achievement is not made easily, but through enormous effort. If one begins to work at 20 and stops working at 70, one can work for 50 years at most. One's life should be viewed not simply quantitatively but qualitatively as well. One's energy is very flexible -- some dispirited people are tired out after working for 8 hours a day, while others can go all out to work as long as 16 hours. The lives of people who work 16 hours a day are twice as long as those of people who work only 8 hours a day. Middle-aged and young cadres, full of vim and vigor, should go all out to perform their work. A revolutionary should devote 90 or even 95 percent of his energy to his work and to doing people good turns. However, there are still many phenomena in which time is wasted. Some comrades are not using their energies where they should be used. They spend a lot of their time thinking over their personal problems. What they are thinking about is simply to gain petty advantages, to get a good house for themselves, to arrange good jobs for their children through the back door, to consider when the leadership will promote them, and so on and so forth. In a word, they have not used their energies where they should be used. In philosophical terms, they have failed to grasp the principal contradiction -- they should live to do people good turns.

THE THIRD REQUIREMENT: TAKE A CORRECT ATTITUDE TOWARD DIFFICULTIES, THAT IS, CORRECTLY HANDLE THE RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN OVERCOMING DIFFICULTIES AND WINNING VICTORIES.
In doing any work at any time one may encounter difficulties. But victories are won and achievements made by surmounting difficulties. In coping with difficulties, one should analyze them and take different attitudes toward different difficulties. In dealing with some difficulties, one must be determined to surmount them. For example, one must have the courage to overcome the unhealthy trends and evil practices as well as the phenomena in which the organization and discipline are defied. As for some difficulties, such as material ones, one has to bear with them for the time being and then try to overcome them step by step. There are also some other difficulties, such as differing opinions that are often aired in day-to-day work because many matters can be handled this or that way. In such cases, one should be good at compromising and regulate contradictions methodically. Sometimes, one has to put aside one's own correct views for a time, views which are correct but which are not endorsed by others. It ie necessary to oppose benign and uncontentious persons who are indifferent to matters of principles. Such persons are afraid of difficulties and advocate "taking it slowly" or "let us study it" in dealing with any matters. Some people regard problems as very complicated. In fact, anything is complicated as well as simple. For example, some people say that agriculture is complicated. Agriculture actually can be clearly explained in two sentences: One is that it is necessary to be determined to do a good job in instituting various forms of the production responsibility system, and the other is that we must never relax our efforts at grain production and must strive to do a good job in developing a diversified economy. In a word, one must be good at grasping the key link; once it is grasped, everything falls into place. Everyone should solve well the question of using different methods to cope with different difficulties. Otherwise, if one fails to surmount difficulties that can be surmounted, one will be frightened by them.

Chairman Mao said that the weather does not necessarily change when black clouds occur in the sky. A communist should be strategically optimistic while tactically careful, and not let himself be blindfolded by difficulties.

THE FOURTH REQUIREMENT: STRUGGLE AGAINST ALL ERRONEOUS AND EVIL THINGS, THAT IS, PAY CLOSE ATTENTION TO THE RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN HAVING FAITH IN TRUTH AND UPHOLDING TRUTH. In pursuing our cause, gross errors and extremely evil tendencies may interfere with and undermine us at any time. But at no time should we bend our heads before them and surrender. Unhealthy trends, evil practices, hideous phenomenon and malign influences will invariably exist over a protracted period. It is impossible to wipe out all of them after a few struggles. Our principle is to minimize their influence as much as possible by exerting vigorous efforts and waging unremitting struggle against them. One of the effective methods to struggle against them is to clearly distinguish them in all spheres and to refuse to surrender to their temptations. As a revolutionary, one must adopt a firm stand. No matter what happens, one must not do anything which runs counter to the interests of the party and the people, and thereby find oneself entrapped. It is necessary to solve issues with regard to relations between individuals on the one hand and the party, the collective and the masses on the other. At no time should one place oneself above the party, the collective or the interests of the people.

THE FIFTH REQUIREMENT: HAVE A CORRECT UNDERSTANDING OF THE RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN PROGRESS AND FAILURE. Everyone has shortcomings and is bound to make mistakes here and there in work. In this world, no one is perfect and no one is free from making errors in one's life, regardless of who one is. It is necessary to rely on all the people and respect the party organization and the collective. A good leader must be good at arousing and giving full rein to the enthusiasm of the people. This is an important skill and art of leadership. What should one do if one commits an error? One must conduct self-criticism. Chairman Mao said: The conscientious and correct, not perfunctory or distorted, practice of self-criticism is still the most outstanding hallmark that distinguishes our party from all other parties. Now some of the comrades who have committed errors refuse to admit their errors or shoulder responsibilities. People, in their minds, refuse to accept such an attitude. One must dare to shoulder responsibility for the acts of one's subordinates. One must be first in assuming responsibility whenever anything that has been jointly decided goes wrong. There is an abnormal phenomenon within the party at present. Some people still talk about "uniting" with those who erred during the "Great Cultural Revolution" and who, following the 3d Plenary Session of the 11th CPC Central Committee, still continue to make errors, but they dare not criticize them. However, at the same time they dare not employ those who committed errors during the "Great Cultural Revolution," but performed well later and withstood tests over a protracted period of time. This is not a good way of doing things. In dealing with those who have committed errors, we must talk to them, help them, and hope that they will correct their errors. This should become a common practice.

THE SIXTH REQUIREMENT: PUT THE CONTINUOUS DEVELOPMENT OF OBJECTIVE THINGS IN A CORRECT RELATIONSHIP TO THE NEED TO CONSTANTLY STUDY THEM. All things develop continuously. Therefore, all comrades must study the new situation and solve the new problems that arise. Generally speaking, our cadres' general and vocational knowledge is limited and their cultural standards are low. It is suggested that everyone spend more time on book reading in a down-to-earth manner. First, we all must study Marxist theory, the "Selected Works of Marx and Engels," the "Selected Works of Lenin," the "Selected Works of Stalin" and the "Selected Works of Mao Zedong." The important documents made public since the 3d Plenary Session of the 11th CPC Central Committee are also Marxist documents which we must read. Second, we must study some history. Third, we must study language, including some classical Chinese and Lu Xun's works, as well as poems. Fourth, we must study some natural science. Fifth, we must study some international politics.

Sixth, we must understand some literary and art works. We must not belittle books which represent the experience of our forerunners. In order to become a mature Marxist who integrates theory with practice, it is essential to conscientiously read many books, perhaps at least 200 million words worth of books. In order to achieve this goal, one must make some sacrifices.

Naturally, book reading alone is not enough. We must also conduct extensive investigations and study. This is the best way to learn things. Just as Comrade Mao Zedong said, social practice is the only criterion for verifying truth. Whenever something crops up, we must use our brains and think. We should not chime in with others or echo the views of others. We must learn how to think, make judgments and shoulder responsibilities independently.

After pointing out the above-mentioned six requirements, Comrade Hu Yaobang said: "In the last century, we, the Chinese people, suffered untold disasters and misery. The prosperity and growth of the state accord with the will of the people and the general trend of events. But, to make major contributions to this cause all depends on our own efforts." He said: The tasks in the next two decades -- at least in the next decade -- [the RENMIN RIBAO version reads: "...next two decades, at least in the last 10 years of this period, and the responsibilities...." and the responsibilities from the beginning of the next century will undoubtedly fall on the shoulders of the middle-aged and young cadres. This is exactly why our party has pinned its entire hopes on the middle-aged and young cadres. The afore-mentioned six requirements can be summarized into one sentence: One should make more demands on oneself at all times.

REPORTS ON NPC STANDING COMMITTEE SESSION

Marine Protection Law Explained

OW191600 Beijing XINHUA in English 1545 GMT 19 Aug 82

[Text] Beijing, August 19 (XINHUA) -- Li Ximing, minister of urban and rural construction and environmental protection, today explained the new draft law on marine environmental protection to the 24th Session of the Fifth National People's Congress Standing Committee, which opened this afternoon.

The emphasis of the law, submitted to the committee today, is on pollution prevention and protection of the marine environment, the minister said. Separate laws are being formulated to cover protection of mineral and aquatic resources.

China has 18,000 kilometers of coastline, he said, and with development of shipping, offshore oil, seaside construction and the dumping of land-based industrial pollutants, it has become pressing to safeguard the marine environment.

The new law, whose violators will be held responsible both administratively and criminally and required to pay compensation, will apply to all units and individuals within the People's Republic as well as all foreign vessels and their related activities in waters under the jurisdiction of China.

The regulations have been coordinated with international marine laws to which China is a party, he said, and were drafted on the basis of China's environmental protection law promulgated in 1979. Consultations were held among government departments, legal and marine specialists and coastal provinces, autonomous regions and municipalities.

Further on Marine Law

[Excerpts] Beijing, 19 Aug (XINHUA) -- Li Ximing, minister of urban and rural construction and environmental protection, today explained the "PRC Law on Marine Environmental Protection" (draft) to the 24th Session of the 5th NPC Standing Committee.

He pointed out: With 18,000 of coastline (exclusive of island coastlines), a vast sea area, numerous islands and a broad continental shelf, our country is abundant in marine organisms and aquatic, mineral, offshore energy and coastal tourist resources and has favorable shipping conditions. Developing, utilizing and protecting the marine environment and resources are important tasks in the socialist modernization drive.

He said: Our country's marine environment is now polluted and impaired to varying degrees, and environmental pollution is quite serious in some estuaries, harbors, inland seas and coastal areas. With the development of marine undertakings, the number of foreign ships entering our territorial waters and foreign companies engaged in petroleum prospecting and exploiting in waters under the jurisdiction of our country has increased with each passing day. It is therefore necessary to strengthen supervision and control over the discharge and dumping of pollutants by foreign ships, platforms and aircraft in order to safeguard the rights and interests of our country.

He said: The "Law on Marine Environmental Protection" (draft) mainly lays down legal rules for the prevention of sea pollution: 1) prevention of marine environmental impairment by seashore projects; 2) prevention of marine environmental pollution by offshore petroleum prospecting and exploiting; 3) prevention of marine environmental pollution by land-based pollutants; 4) prevention of marine environmental pollution by ships; 5) prevention of marine environmental pollution caused by the dumping of waste materials. In addition, in the chapter of legal responsibility, the law stipulates that its violators will be held responsible, both administratively and criminally, and required to pay compensation.

Li Ximing said: The Law on Marine Environmental Protection" will not only have binding force on all units and individuals of our country, but involve supervision and control over foreign vessels, offshore petroleum prospecting and exploiting and foreign enterprises' activities in waters under the jurisdiction of our country. In drafting the law, attention was therefore paid to coordinating with relevant international conventions and practices.

Trademark Law Explained

OW191606 Beijing XINHUA in English 1550 GMT 19 Aug 82

[Text] Beijing, August 19 (XINHUA) -- Ren Zhonglin, director of the General Administration for Industry and Commerce, today explained the new draft law on tradesmarks to the 24th Session of the Standing Committee of the Fifth National People's Congress, which opened this afternoon.

The draft was submitted to the committee today. Its main emphasis, the director said, is protection of the exclusive right to use a trademark, without fear of infringement.

The law, for the benefit of both Chinese and foreign enterprises, is a new version of an earlier 1963 law, "Regulations for Trademark Control," which, Ren Zhonglin said, "can no longer suit the needs of modern day." By the end of June, he said, 73,000 trademarks had been registered in China, including 9,900 foreign ones. The most important aim of trademark control, he said, is to forbid deception of consumers.

Foreign firms applying for trademark registration will be handled according to the agreeement or joint treaty between China and the applicant's country.

Trademarks Further Discussed

OW200832 Beijing XINHUA Domestic Service in Chinese 1519 GMT 19 Aug 82

[Excerpt] Beijing, 19 Aug (XINHUA) -- Ren Zhonglin, director of the General Administration for Industry and Commerce, today explained the "Law on Trademarks of the PRC" (draft) to the 24th Session of the Standing Committee of the 5th National People's Congress.

Ren Zhonglin said: China has enacted two laws on trademarks since its founding. "The Provisional Regulations for Trademark Registration" were promulgated in July 1950 and the revised "Regulations for Trademark Control" were promulgated in April 1963. The latter regulations have been in use until today. In view of the new situation in recent years, the "Regulations for Trademark Control" no longer meet the needs of the new historical period. Some articles have to be revised and supplemented and additional articles have to be added. To facilitate the development of the socialist commodity economy and to perfect the socialist legal system, the "Law on Trademarks of the PRC" (draft) has been worked out after extensive investigation, research and solicitation of the opinions of various departments, localities and other sources. The law has given due consideration to the domestic situation and to international practices.

He said: To protect the right to use trademarks and to forbid infringement are important means for perfecting the law on trademarks. Much attention has been paid to protecting the right to use trademarks in the draft law. After application and approval for registration of trademarks, the enterprises have acquired the right of use upon which no one must infringe. He continued: Commodity quality is the basis for the prestige of trademarks and is closely related to the interests of consumers. The draft law on trademarks has made relevant stipulations on the control of trademarks and supervision of the quality of commodities to forbid the deception of consumers. This is a salient characteristic of the law which has stressed the importance of trademark control work. Punishments for the use of unregistered trademarks, for the misuse of registered trademarks, for poor manufacture of commodities and for use of inferior products to deceive consumers are stipulated in the draft law.

Ren Zhonglin concluded: Foreign firms applying for trademark registration will be handled according to the agreement or joint treaty between China and the applicant's country and in line with the principle of reciprocity.

YANG SHANGKUN ADDRESSES PLA AIR FORCE CONGRESS

[Text] Beijing, 18 Aug (XINHUA) -- The congress of the PLA Air Force advanced elements in promoting socialist spiritual civilization, which concluded on 18 August, made a proposal to the vast number of the air force commanders and fighters: Have the revolutionary ideal in mind; do your job well; open up a new prospect for learning, catching up with the advanced and creating meritorious deeds' and let spiritual civilization blossom in every airfield and military compund in order to usher in the 12th Congress with still better results.

Yang Shangkun and Wei Guoqing, responsible persons of the Military Commission of the CPC Central Committee, and Liu Huaqing, Liang Biye, Gan Weihan, Huang Yukun, Shi Jinqian, Hua Nan, Xu Guangyi and other responsible persons of all PLA commands were present at the congress on 18 August.

Yang Shangkun addressed the congress. Representing the Military Commission of the CPC Central Committee and all PLA commands, he highly praised and congratulated the air force on the fruitful results achieved since the launching of the movement to promote spiritual civilization and encouraged all commanders and fighters to make persistent efforts to achieve new results in promoting spiritual civilization. He said: Last year the air force launched the activities of "paying attention to courtesy, and soldiers,' appearance, bearing and discipline." The activities were vigorously carried out. They expedited the movement throughout the PLA. The air force party committee led all commanders and fighters in persistently following the four fundamental principles and seriously implementing the party's line, principles and policies laid down since the 3d Plenary Session of the 11th CPC Central Committee and the air force command. As a result, the air force units have taken on a new appearance. To launch the activities of promoting spiritual civilization in a deepgoing and sustained way in the future, Yang Shangkun urged the units to meet the following four requirements:

1. Deepen your understanding. Promoting spiritual civilization is a long-term strategic task. The central task is to use communist ideology to educate cadres and fighters.

2. Strengthen your study. It is necessary to study hard and master the basic theory of Marxism-Leninism-Mao Zedong Thought, consciously remold your world outlook, preserve the purity of communism and resist the erosion of capitalist ideology and the influence of bourgeois liberalization.

3. Quietly immerse yourselves in solid work. It is very good to "have the revolutionary ideal in mind and do one's job well." Like any other work, promoting spiritual civilization calls for seriousness and earnestness.

4. The leading cadres must take the lead. The air force has maintained a good work style which emphasizes that all comrades, including the commander, the political commissar and other air force leading comrades at the higher level and cadres at the grassroots level, must act well as "file leaders." This is correct. Promoting spiritual civilization must also begin with leading cadres at all levles.

The congress opened on 12 August. The more than 800 representatives from all air force fronts represented over 2,400 advanced units and over 45,000 advanced persons who emerged in air force units over the past year and more with the launching of the campaign to promote socialist spiritual civilization. Among them were aircraft and ground crews who made contributions to the defense of the motherland's territorial airspace day and night. Also included were cadres and fighters of the ground troops who colorfully fulfilled the task of combat training, veteran heroes and models who achieved new results and made new contributions, and new heroes and models who emerged only recently. All representatives seriously studied the communique of the 7th Plenary Session of the 11th CPC Central Committee, recalled the results achieved under the guidance of the party's line, principles and policies since the 3d Plenary Session of the 11th CPC Central Committee and summarized and exchanged experiences. They were determined to promote the air force's spiritual civilization to a new level.

At the congress, the air force party committee separately conferred honorary titles of pace setters and models on 121 advanced units and individuals.

Zhang Tingfa, commander of the air force, and Gao Houliang, political commissar of the air force, attended and addressed the congress.

YANG SHANGKUN SPEAKS AT NAVY ADVANCED CONGRESS

OW192036 Beijing XINHUA Domestic Service in Chinese 1539 GMT 18 Aug 82

It fundamentally solves the question of a man's political consciousness, moral character, work style, discipline and knowledge of science and culture and increases the units' fighting capacity.

Yang Shangkun said: The navy is a scientifically and technically complex combined armed service. It stands guard in the forefront of the motherland's sea defense. Many naval units are also stationed in forward areas invaded more often by capitalist ideology. Promoting socialist spiritual civilization and resisting the erosion of capitalist ideology and other erroneous ideas so that our cadres and fighters can have an ideal in mind, pay attention to morality, observe discipline, raise their scientific and cultural levels, and be good at using modern weapons and equipment are of special significance in terms of enhancing the navy's fighting capacity. He said: The core of promoting socialist spiritual civilization is to have the communist ideal in mind. "Be dedicated to the navy and revolution," "love your warship, your island and the sea" and other demands set and carried out by the navy are all vivid embodiments of the communist ideal in practice. We should publicize them.

Wei Guoqing, responsible person of the Military Commission of the CPC Central Committee, and He Zhengwen, Liang Biye, Gan Weihan, Huang Yukun, Shi Jinqian, Xu Guangyi and other responsible persons of all PLA commands were present at the congress on 18 August.

The congress was held 11 to 18 August. It studied the question of conducting well education in communist ideology among the naval units. The 600 or more representatives who attended the congress were determined to bring their exemplary and backbone role and role as a bridge into full play in the activities of promoting spiritual civilization in order to promote the navy's revolutionization, modernization and regularization. After holding serious discussions and summarizing and exchanging experiences, the representatives unanimously pointed out: To conduct education in the communist ideal among the naval units, we must meet the following five requirements:

1. It is necessary to conscientiously organize the study of Marxism-Leninism-Mao Zedong Thought so that our cadres and fighters can understand the principle of communism and know that communism will inevitably replace the law of capitalist social development. This is the fundamental approach to fostering the communist ideal.

2. It is necessary to conduct education in revolutionary traditions and education in the history of the party, the army, the Chinese revolution and social development to inspire our cadres and fighters to cherish a deep love for the party, the motherland and the army.

3. It is necessary to make unremitting efforts to struggle against bourgeois liberalization and the erosion of capitalist ideology and to preserve the purity of communism.

4. It is necessary to lead our cadres and fighters to closely integrate the communist ideal with revolutionary practice, foster the revolutionary ideal and do their own jobs well.

5. It is necessary to continue launching the activities of learning from Lei Feng and learning from heroes and models so that our cadres and fighters can follow good examples while fostering the communist ideal.

At the congress the navy party committee commended 120 advanced collectives and persons and set up 24 pace setters. Ye Fei, Li Yaowen, Liu Daosheng and other responsible comrades of the naval units attended and addressed the congress.

HONGQI COMMENTATOR ON PARTY SPIRIT, STUDY

HK191417 Beijing HONGQI in Chinese No 15, 1 Aug 82 pp 16-18

[Commentator's article: "Heighten Party Spirit, Improve the Style of Study"]

[Text] Since the 3d Plenary Session of the 11th CPC Central Committee, we have taken a big stride forward toward heightening party spirit and improving the style of study.

In order to victoriously shoulder the ever more arduous and strenuous tasks entrusted to us by the party and the state, it is still necessary for us to make greater efforts in this respect. On the ideological, theoretical, educational, news, literary, art and publication fronts, not only the comrades in leading positions but every cadre and every research worker, including the comrades who have moved to the second line and who have temporarily left their jobs for recuperation or retired, are confronted with the problem of constantly heightening party spirit and improving the style of study.

Heightening party spirit is inseparable from improving the style of study. Comrade Mao Zedong linked heightening of party spirit with the Marxist style of study. It is chiefly due to sabotage by the Lin Biao and Jiang Qing counterrevolutionary cliques -- this historical reason -- that until now we have not succeeded in fundamentally improving party work style. Although party work style in quite a few localities, departments and units is much better that it was in the past and is getting better and better, there are still considerable gaps compared with the best level ever recorded. In 1943, Comrade Chen Yun, who was head of the organizational department at that time, delivered a speech to the literary and art workers due to leave for the rural areas. It is almost 40 years since then and yet the truth contained in that speech is still applicable today with respect to comrades who engage in literary and art work. It is likewise applicable with respect to comrades who engage in propaganda, cultural and other work. He said, whether you are a specialist in a certain field or a person engaged in some sort of work, you should first regard yourself as an ordinary CPC member. Every CPC member should conscientiously think over this problem. As a CPC member, whether you have scored great achievements, hold a high position or have been in the party for a long time, do you first of all think that you are an ordinary CPC member when you are speaking, writing and doing work? We express our readiness to obey the party organizations when we take the oath on being admitted to the party. However, when the organization assigns work to us, can we always resolutely abide by the assignments and strive to accomplish the tasks? Naturally, it is permissible, by stating the reasons, to ask the organization to consider assigning us another job so that we can work more and better for the party. However, from the erroneous words and deeds of some party members we can see they they have forgotten even the basic rules a party member should abide by. With respect to this matter, we should not be excessively accommodating. When a party member exceeds what is proper in both his words and deeds, he should make self-criticism and correct his mistakes. Otherwise, the discipline of our party will become lax and corrupted. At present, there are indeed a small number of party members who regard themselves as infallible and who, when writing articles or delivering speeches, do not consider whether their articles and speeches conform to the party's line, principles and policies. They only remember that they are specialists in certain fields or heads of some sort but forgot that they are first of all CPC members. This is very bad indeed.

The leading system of our party must be reformed and the forms of party organization may also undergo some changes. However, there is no change in the fact that every party member should abide by the party rules and regulations. So long as you are a CPC member, whether you are a head of a certain department or a specialist in a certain field, you must be honest and faithful to the CPC branch, the general CPC branch and the CPC committee and to the organization. You should abide by the party rules and regulations and should not violate them. You should obey the leadership, supervision and education of the organization which you are in and should not reject this leadership, supervision and education.

The CPC Central Committee has on many occasions raised the question of consolidating the party. It is first of all necessary to conduct ideological education in order to raise ideological consciousness and, on the basis of the ideological education, carry out consolidation of the organization step by step. In the course of the ideological education, every party member should conscientiously judge if he conforms to the requirements for a party member. If he does not come up to the requirements, he should strive to achieve them. If he does not want to exert himself and if he is really unqualified, it is no good letting him stay in the party.

It is necessary for every party member to constantly consider this question: Am I a qualified or an unqualified party member? What should I do if I am unqualified? There are only two ways out: One is to strive to become qualified and the other is to refuse to make any efforts and so have to give up party membership. It will not do for a person who is unqualified to stay in the party for this will implicate the party and undermine the party's image. This is a very serious question with respect to comrades who are already party members now and comrades who have applied for party membership. In order to be a qualified party member, it is imperative for our words and deeds to conform to the requirements of the party constitution.

In a socialist country like ours, the party is in a leading position. The composition, organization and conditions of the party are extremely important not only to the party itself but also to the entire cause of the socialist modernization program, the destiny of the state and the prospects of the nation. Recently a leading comrade of the CPC Central Committee said that efforts should be made to enable our party members to become qualified party members and our cadres to become qualified cadres so that the combat effectiveness of the party not only comes up to but also surpasses the highest level in the party's history. If the party organizations at various levels and all party members come up to the requirements of the party, we shall be fully confident of greatly pushing our work forward and smoothly accomplishing the historic task of the socialist modernization program. No matter how many difficulties and obstacles we may meet, we shall have sufficient strength to vanquish them. Confronted with such a serious problem, no party member should adopt the attitude of "letting things drift if they do not affect one personally." We should not only strive to become a qualified party member but also be responsible for supervising other party members and find out if they are qualified as party members. With respect to unqualified party members, it is necessary to criticize and help them. If they turn a deaf ear to criticism and refuse to accept help, we must be bold to speak out and make suggestions on dealing with them to the party organization. This is a manifestation of holding ourselves responsible to the party, the people and the cause of socialism and communism.

The question of heightening party spirit is the lifelong duty of every party member and its requirements must be increasingly higher. First of all, we should strive to be a qualified party member. If we fail to become qualified, how can we raise the requirements? Now we do not set demands from the highest standards but from the requirements of the party rules and regulations. As far as a CPC member is concerned, these are the minimum requirements. If a party member fails to abide by the party rules and regulations, how can he fight for the cause of communism all his life and place the party's interests in the first place?

Every party member must be subject to supervision. The CPC committee, general CPC branch and CPC branch and every party member must first of all supervise the leading responsible comrade of their department and see whether he carries out or violates the principles and policies of the CPC Central Committee. If violations have been noticed, criticism can be made to his face. If a party member has been subjected to retaliation on this count, he can lodge complaints with the CPC committee at the higher levels up to the Central Committee.

Heightening party spirit intrinsically involves the necessity of improving the style of study.

Propaganda work is a task imbued with strong party spirit and scientific nature. Broadly speaking, it is in the catagory of social science. In the past few years, tremendous achievements have indeed been scored in the research work of social science. Especially in the economic and political aspects, the numerous social science workers have taken an active part in the discussions of relevant questions and the many views they have raised have played a good role in practical work. They have also done much better than before in conducting investigation and study and in collecting data and their consciousness is also higher than before. This constitutes progress.

However, it is still necessary to greatly improve our style of study. For example, in the past few years, great changes have taken place in the rural areas and the situation is excellent. The peasants heartily welcome the policies of the CPC Central Committee and everyone is jubilant. However, some research workers refuse to go the rural areas. They are reluctant or unwilling to listen to the voice of millions of people and the views of the worker and peasant masses. This cannot be considered as good style of study. Even if we make cursory observation for a very short time, it will greatly help our work and contribute to our understanding. It is very important to ask the departments concerned to supply some material. However, no matter how rich the material may be, it is still material gained in the past or secondhand material. As far as people who engage in research work are concerned, it is necessary to gather secondhand material. However, where conditions permit, it is more important to gather firsthand material. After all, there are great disparities between the material gained from written documents and actual life. If we manage to find time to go to various provinces, prefectures, counties, communes and production brigades and have a look at the peasants' homes, we shall feel that we have gained much more substantial and abundant material than we did from written material. This greatly helps to increase our knowledge and broaden our thinking. Ours is a very big country. The natural and economic conditions and the cultural levels in various localities of the rural areas are different and the economic developments are very uneven. It is therefore necessary to have various forms of agricultural production responsibility system. Even the same type of responsibility system, such as the implementation of the contract system in an overall way, often varies a great deal in localities of different economic development. In developing agriculture, it is also necessary to rely mainly on the planned economy and supplement it with regulation by market mechanism; and, with respect to the peasants' freedom, if we do not handle it well, it will affect the state plan. If we go to the grass roots to conduct investigation and study, we shall be able to confirm that the principles laid down by the CPC Central Committee conform to reality and thus deepen our understanding. There are many branches of learning in social science and so the requirements for getting in touch with reality cannot follow the same pattern. A person who engages in the study of history comes into contact with material quite different from that studied by a person who engages in solving practical problems. Even if you are a person who engages in the study of history, it will also do you a lot of good if you go to the grass roots and have a look. Owing to different historical conditions in the past and different economic development in various localities, the implementation of public ownership of the means of production and the agricultural production responsibility system also frequently bear the imprint of history. This historical imprint cannot but exert an influence on current work and practice.

The CPC Central Committee and the State Council are dealing with practical problems every day. If the comrades who engage in the study of social science do not understand new situations and fail to put forward good proposals for solving new problems, it is impossible to do our work well. Even if we manage to knock together some opinions, they will not be accepted. We have a number of economists, some of whom have played a very good role in helping the CPC Central Committee and the State Council to determine the principles and policies. Now the party and state attach great importance to social science and place tremendous hopes on it. So long as there are good suggestions, the party and state will give serious consideration to them. This situation has never occurred since liberation. However, have we put forward programs, plans and suggestions which have original ideas and analysis and which are really capable of solving problems? Yes, but not very many. Are there people who can put forward such proposals? Yes, but they are not very many either.

How shall we change this state of affairs in order to meet the needs of the party and state? It is necessary to gradually make efforts, to go deep into the realities of life and to get in touch with the masses. If, by 1985, most of the recipes devised by people who engage in the study of economics are suited to the case and are capable of curing the sickness and the number of such recipes is getting greater and greater, this proves that we have improved our style of study and that we have made great progress in our work.

In order to reform the economic system in an all-round way, it is necessary for us to conscientiously understand and give consideration to foreign experiences. However, this can only serve as a reference. There are 1 billion people in China, 800 million of whom are peasants. It just does not work to copy indiscriminately the most successful experience from any country or locality. What is most important is that we should constantly seek and sum up our experience in our practice. It is necessary to attach sufficient importance to our own experiences, both positive and negative. In reforming the economic system, it is necessary to fully study the successful experiences during the 1950's and, in light of the current situation, go on advancing and making a breakthrough. With respect to these questions, have our comrades who engage in economic and research work made a thorough study of them? Have they placed them on the agenda? These matters are closely related to the improvement of our style of study.

Improvement of the style of study has become the key to doing a good job of, and improving the level of, the entire propaganda and social science work. It has become the key to playing our role in the socialist modernization program. To this end we must make unremitting efforts.

CENTRAL ORGANS HOLD MEETING ON ECONOMIC CRIME

[Text] Beijing, 19 Aug (XINHUA) -- The party committee of the central state organs held a meeting 18-19 August to exchange experience in fighting economic crime. The meeting stressed that it is necessary to sum up experience, further strengthen leadership over work for striking at economic crime, and take effective measures to accelerate the speed and quality of handling cases of economic crime so as to better carry out the work.

Attending the meeting were secretaries and deputy secretaries of the party committees of the various central state departments and organizations, the responsible persons of the discipline inspection groups (or committees) under the various party groups, as well as personnel who are responsible for handling cases of economic crime.

Comrades of the Ministry of Chemical Industry, the State Seismological Bureau and the Ministry of Culture briefed those present on their experience in handling cases of economic crime. They held that seriously strengthening leadership of the party committees in combating economic crime is the key to handling such cases well. Their experience also shows that the guarantee to properly handling these cases of economic crime is assigning responsible persons to the task and adhering to the mass line. While striking at economic crime, the party's work style must be improved, ideological and political work for party members and the masses must be strengthened, and the rules and regulations must be established and perfected. Only thus can we score greater success in striking at economic crime.

Wang Rui, deputy secretary of the party committee of the central state organs, addressed the meeting. He hoped that the various units would continue to seriously study the directive of the CPC Central Committee and the State Council on striking at economic crime. Leaders at various levels must investigate and handle the major cases and promptly help relevant personnel solve difficulties and earnestly support them in handling the cases. The current laxity in ideology must be overcome and the experience gained in the new situation of assigning responsible persons to the task and adhering to the mass line in handling cases of economic crime must be summed up. Only thus can the cadres and masses be inspired to carry through to the end the struggle against economic crime.

JINGJI YANJIU DISCUSSES UNEMPLOYMENT SOLUTION

HK200347 Beijing JINGJI YANJIU in Chinese No 7, 20 Jul 82 pp 79-80

Article by Dong Yugui [5516 3768 7607] of the financial research institute of Hei Longjiang Province: "On the Fundamental Solution of the Problem of Labor Force Employment"]

[Text] How do we do away with job-awaiting and achieve full employment? To answer this question, first, one has to start with the nature of the employment problem and then make an analysis and do research. The so-called social employment problem can be divided into three types as far as its nature is concerned:

1. The technical employment problem (or what is called the natural employment problem). For any society, there could appear any of three situations. The first is that the means of production basically suits the productive forces. The second is that there are more means of production. The third is that there are more productive forces. The third situation is the technical employment problem which occurs occasionally.

2. The flexible exmployment problem (or what is called the economic employment problem). Social production has to be carried out according to a proportion, but conforming to the proportion is not something absolute. Generally speaking, mutual suitability of different proportional relations is constituted by a single magnitude and is not indicated by a single absolute value.

Moreover, the various departments of the national economy will manifest the ever changing conditions according to the different forms of combination. Therefore, it is rather difficult to make the best choice in a short period. The imbalance occurs because the different proportional relations move in different directions within the magnitude or because of an imbalance caused by the imperfect structure of the economic departments. The job-awaiting problem thus resulting from it is called the flexible employment problem. This problem is produced by flexibility and therefore it can be solved through a flexible economy.

3. The systematic employment problem (or what is called the employment problem of an economic relations nature). It arises from the essence of the economic system or the relations of production. Its concentrated expression is the law of population and the law of accumulation under a social system. The law of population and the law of accumulation which are decided by capitalist surplus value reflect the historical limitation of the capitalist system which in turn gives rise to its inevitable final elimination. The idea of treating socialist job-awaiting as capitalist unemployment and the idea of believing that the rise of capital formation in socialist society will inevitably cause overpopulation are groundless.

I believe that because of its nature, the job-awaiting population produced by our country's socialist society at present should is a technical employment problem and not a systematic employment problem. It will be solved when our country's national economy extricated itself from the predicament created by the influence of the subjective and objective historical factors and when this turns into a benign cycle. Fundamentally speaking, the problem should be solved by fully displaying the advantages of the socialist public-owned economy.

(II) Cutting short the working hours and practising universal employment is a fundamental solution for the problem of socialist job-awaiting. This is because:

First, this is decided by the superiority of socialist public ownership. Socialist public ownership enables all workers to enjoy the equal status of masters of the means of production and it also causes socialist production to serve the economic interests of all laborers. Socialist countries on the one hand force all members of the exploiting class to take part in physical labour and on the other hand, promulgate labor laws to guarantee the working rights of every citizen who is able to work. Therefore the society will organize gradual employment for the job-awaiting population that exists because of the flexibility of economic development.

Second, cutting short the working hours and practising universal employment are decided by the socialist law of population and the socialist law of accumulation. The superiority of socialist public ownership is shown not only in the planned character of production and the fairly rapid rise of labor productivity in the process of reproduction; in tendency, it is shown in the socialist law of population and the law of accumulation. There is a close association between these two laws yet this still needs further research. The main contents are: (1) When the means of production that are manufactured increase with each passing day, each socialist laborer will manufacture more abundant means to further free himself from nature. (2) Socialist laborers are masters of scientific techniques. The achievements they make in developing scientific techniques will reduce their own labor and the working hours but will not cause unemployment. (3) The time saved can be devoted to the leisure and entertainment of laborers. Apart from that, it can be devoted to the promotion of laborers' level of knowledge. (4) With the promotion of labor productivity of society and the mass accumulation of social wealth, each laborer's all-round development will be stimulated so as to create conditions for the breaking of the old labor division and the final transition to communism.

Third, cutting short the working hours and practising universal employment are demanded by the character of socialized mass production. One can see from world history that the general tendency is for working hours to develop in the direction of gradual reduction. This indicates that the reduction of working hours depends upon the development of productive forces. This is an objective law which does not revolve round people's subjective will.

Finally, cutting short working hours and practising universal employment is a demand for opening up the intellectual pool, promoting all-round development of laborers and creating conditions for realizing a benign economic cycle on the basis of modernization. At present, the nature of our country's job-awaiting problem is flexible job-awaiting. Unified consideration should be given to the study of the job-awaiting problem and the situation of the employed laborers. Nowadays, there are a number of people who have difficulty in finding a job, and there are some jobs which can't be filled by qualified personnel. Some people have jobs to do but they are listless and their efficiency is low, while some people's burden is too heavy for them to work efficiently. As a result, labor productivity is low, national income is low and the accumulation is small, which in turn affects the solution of job-awaiting. Low labor productivity is the basic reason for our being unable to immediately implement universal employment through reducing working hours. Another reason is that the development of scientific, cultural and educational undertakings can't catch up with the situation and the intellectual levels of laborers are too low. Developing education and developing "knowledge centralized" production is the strategic basis of our solution of the job-awaiting problem.

If we take the development of "labour centralized" production as the strategic basis, the result will certainly be that the further we go, the narrower the road will be. Having solved a large number of "job-awaiting" cases, still more "jobs-awaiting" cases will quick appear. This is absolutely not a broad road, and further development will only go against the strategic aims of the four modernizations.

(III) At present, owning to the fact that our country's productivity is low, and the development level of scientific and cultural undertakings is not high, it is not possible for the objective developing trend of reducing working hours and implementing universal trend of reducing working hours and implementing universal employment to be immediately obvious over a wide range. Therefore it is still necessary to adopt the method of using economic flexibility as a supplementary method for solving the job-awaiting problem.

First, we must actively support the "four-shift" 6-hour work system produced by the experimental economic reform points. If we widely practise the 6 hour work system, total working hours will be reduced by one-quarter. This means that there will be an increase in the number of people employed equal to one-third of the total original number of staff and workers. Factories that have underutilized capacity should make active reduction in the working hours and give their staff and workers training. This might well result in one stone killing two birds.

Second, developing cultural education, admitti g job-awaiting youths to colleges, reducing the working hours of staff and workers, developing adult education, practising knowledge rejuvenation, achieving results through scientific techniques and increasing national income -- all these may speed up the reduction of working hours and the solving of the job-awaiting problem.

Third, practising flexible employment. From the angle of the overall balance of the national economy, making use of flexibility in economic development to increase the number of people employed is highly feasible. Its main aspects are: 1) Structure flexibility -- Developing production by centralized labor strengthening the service trades of commerce and developing the collective and individual economy. 2) Family flexibility -- With constant increase on wages those who have conditions can consider either the wife or the husband going out to work, while the other stays home and does housework. Both sides can thus enhance efficiency. 3) Educational flexibility -- Developing specialized education, changing the educational structure of middle schools, carrying out adult education, life education and part-time education. 4) Competition flexibility -- Encouraging job-awaiting persons to find job opportunities in economic competition or found economic organizations for employment. 5) Efficiency flexibility -- Enhancing economic effects, increasing factory funds, running subsidiary enterprises and employing more youths. 6) Demanding flexibility -- Creating as many job opportunities as possible through the diverse nature of demands. 7) Self-study flexibility -- Encouraging young people to take the road of self-study and growing up to be useful people. 8) Urban-rural relations flexibility -- Encouraging young people to teach in the suburbs or the rural areas, and to take part in cultural and scientific activities. 9) Ideological flexibility -- Educating young people to have a correct understanding of employment, to look for opportunities in the collective and individual economy, and to do one's bit for socialism. 10) Funds flexibility -- Making use of the existing funds, and running economic projects which use less money but which take up more idle people. 11) Systems flexibility -- Stipulating various correct employment policies and so on. Flexibile employment may not solve the employment problem for good, but it can, to a great extent, solve many employment problems at the present historical stage. Let's wait until the national economy changes to a benign cycle, and then through reducing working hours fundamentally solve the employment problem.

RENMIN RIBAO ON NEED FOR BUSINESS REGISTRATION

[Commentator's article: "An Important Measure for Safeguarding Economic Order"]

[Text] The "Regulations on Registration and Administration of Industrial and Commerical Enterprises" promulgated by the State Council are relatively perfect laws formulated since the founding of the PRC for governing the registration and administration of industrial and commercial enterprises.

Why is it necessary for industrial and commercial enterprises to be registered? What role will this registration play? Quite a number of people are not clear about this. In particular, some people find the registration and administration of enterprises owned by the whole people beyond their comprehension and say that "this is an unnecessary move." Obviously, they have misunderstood this. They have confused the approval to open an enterprise by its supervisory department and the planning department with the approval to register an enterprise by the department responsible for the administrative control over this enterprise. Approving the opening of an enterprise and approving the registration of an enterprise are two steps for going through different legal procedures. They will produce different legal effects. The opening of an enterprise is approved chiefly by considering the social needs and considering whether there are possibilities for opening such an enterprise, whether its location is good and whether the necessary conditions exist. The approval to register an enterprise is the legal procedure which the industrial and commerical administration department, entrusted by the state, enforces on behalf of the government. Once its registration is approved, an enterprise will enjoy legal rights and be protected by law. As stipulated in the "Regulations on Registration and Administration of Industrial and Commercial Enterprises," an industrial or commercial enterprise will be permitted to open a banking account, to make construction preparations and to carry out production or business, and enjoy the exclusive right to use its name, provided its registration has been approved and it has obtained the permit to make construction preparations and a business license. Otherwise, under no circumstances is it permitted to make construction preparations, start business, make an official seal, sign contracts, or register its trademark or advertise, and the bank will refuse to open an account to serve such an enterprise. This shows that there is clear legal distinction between an enterprise which has been registered and one which has not been registered. Strengthening registration and administration of industrial and commercial enterprises is an important measure for safeguarding socialist economic order. In some localities at present, small enterprises are overlapping and carry out production blindly, disrupting the state plan. There are also cases in which a factory without a workshop, equipment, capital funds or fixed personnel or a company existing in the form of a "briefcase" is set up to carry out speculative and other illegal business activities, thus disrupting normal economic order. By strengthening the work of examining and approving the opening of enterprises and their registration, the industrial and commercial administration department can stop their illegal activities by enforcing the laws. It should be pointed out that in various parts of the country at present, there still are business households which have not been examined, approved and registered. A time limit should be set for them to register themselves in accordance with "Regulations on Registration and Administration of Industrial and Commerical Enterprises." The unlicensed enterprises or those which have been registered but carry out illegal business should be resolutely stopped or banned.

Registration is an administrative measure to supervise the management of the enterprises. All enterprises have the responsibility to safeguard the solemnity of the "Regulations on Registration and Administration of Industrial and Commerical Enterprises" and to consciously accept supervision of their management. Some comrades regard this work as registering and licensing and are reluctant to accept supervision. They are incorrect. Registration and administration form an inseparable entity. Registration without administration is meaningless. In the final analysis, registration and administration mean supervising the enterprises according to the policy. In carrying out supervision and administration, the industrial and commercial administration organs and other relevant departments should draw a clear demarcation line between "liveliness" and "disorders" and between the normal change in trade or scope of production or business and the illegal business activities violating the policy.

They should strengthen registration and administration and block the loopholes in this link which may give rise to economic crimes, so as to safeguard normal economic order, direct the economic activities of enterprises onto the path of the party's principles and policies and the state plan and guide the enterprises to develop healthily in the direction of socialism.

RENMIN RIBAO DISCUSSES CONSCIOUS INITIATIVE

[Article by Zhang Huajin [1728 5478 6855]: "An Inquiry Into Man's Conscious Initiative"]

[Text] Man's Conscious Initiative, Science and Technology

Man's conscious initiative is generated by his physiology. It is a natural force innate in him. It is also the cognitive power and practical ability which he acquires through study and practice on the basis of the ability generated by his physiology. This chiefly refers to his scientific and technical knowledge. The history of human knowledge shows that man's ability to display his conscious initiative is his scientific and technical knowledge, which he acquires chiefly through study and education. The level of man's scientific and technical knowledge indicates his ability to understand and transform the world under given conditions. Man's conscious initiative is characterized by the continuity of history. A country or nation has to vigorously popularize scientific and technical knowledge in order to increase its ability to transform nature and society. A comparison shows that people who have received scientific and technical education and people who have not received this education will achieve quite obvious and really different results in their work and labor, and this applies to people who have received primary education and those who have received higher education. Scientific and technical education aims at "developing man's ability." Formerly, we often misinterpreted man's conscious initiative as "work" or a "job." After the 3d Plenary Session of the 11th CPC Central Committee, efforts have been made to sum up past experiences and lessons. While emphasis is placed on requiring the cadres and the masses to seriously study Marxism-Leninism-Mao Zedong Thought. Particular emphasis is placed on developing education and popularizing scientific and technical knowledge, and a series of effective measures have been adopted. This is of far-reaching strategic significance in increasing the ability of the whole society and the whole nation to understand and transform the world.

Man's Conscious Initiative and Scientific Foresight

Some time ago, man's conscious initiative was simply summed up as practice. This was stated in some recent articles: "Man's initiative depends on practicality." In my opinion, this was not an overall representation because it neglected scientific foresight, which is an important aspect of man's conscious initiative.

Objectively, the characteristics and functions, which are related but not identical, of man's conscious initiative are the scientific foresight based on his understanding of objective laws and the practicality of transforming the objective world. It is inappropriate to study man's conscious initiative by stressing practicality (which is fundamental) at the expense of foresight.

Engels said: "The further men are removed from animals, the more their effect on nature will assume the character of premeditated, planned action directed toward definite ends known in advance." ("Selected Works of Marx and Engels," vol 3, p 516) In his article "On Protracted War," Mao Zedong also discussed man's conscious initiative. He said: "Whatever is done has to be done by human beings" and "For such action to be effective there must be people who derive ideas, principles or views from the objective facts and put forward plans, directive, policies, strategies and tactics." Thus, as pointed out by the revolutionary teachers, scientific foresight is of great importance in directing social practice and attaining better results in practice.

In leading China's revolutionary struggles, Comrade Mao Zedong paid close attention to the function of scientific foresight. He repeatedly admonished us: We should not only do our work and make revolution, but also have a good grasp of the laws of development of the revolutionary struggles, see the invariable trend of transformation of contradictions, and establish the confidence of victory. Led by the CPC, the army and the people defied strong foes, and never lost heart despite defeats but pressed forward with indomitable will precisely because they had displayed their conscious initiative in analyzing the situation, grasping the general trend of current developments and foreseeing the future.

The study of natural science cannot be separated from scientific foresight. That is, efforts should be made to analyze and understand the essence of natural phenomena on the basis of practice and to apply this understanding in studying the possible changes of things from a low grade to a high grade, from simplicity to complexity and from one form to another, as well as the trends and conditions of these changes, so as to promote the profound development of scientific research and achieve still greater results.

Genuinely advanced scientific theories and technical knowledge play a positive role in discerning the essence and laws of the objects of study. Scientific foresight is a function vested in every branch of science. The higher the scientific level, the keener the foresight will be. The importance of scientific forecasts to our country's socialist construction is evident. In carrying out various tasks in our country's socialist construction, we absolutely should not confine our scope of vision to the present and neglect the future. In making plans and drawing up measures, we absolutely should not exclusively aim at immediate interests, but must take heed of the results which may occur 10 or 20 years afterward.

Man's Conscious Initiative and the Actual Results

Man's consious initiative may be correct or erroneous. People often say that it should be determined by judging whether it is compatible with reality. Of course, they are right. However, we must think more deeply about these questions: What kind of initiative is compatible with reality? How should compatibility with reality be measured? The actual results of practice are the basic criteria. They are the yardstick for measuring the conscious initiative.

In his report on the work of the government delivered at the Fourth Session of the Fifth NPC, Comrade Zhao Ziyang summed up the experiences and lessons since the founding of the PRC. He pointed out: "The increase in our national income in the past 32 years has been much less than that in the total value of industrial and agricultural output, and the people's standard of living has lagged far behind the national income. The results of our economic construction have not been what they should be." "From now on we must tackle all economic problems with better economic results as the fundamental objective." At the same time, focusing on achieving better economic results, he put forth the 10 principles for future economic construction. These have deeply enlightened us. In carrying out economic construction, as in doing any other work, we must pay attention to economic results. Dialectical-materialist conscious initiative is the initiative resulting from the unity of dialectics, which is based on materialism, and epistemology. The concept of achieving good results should be a basic concept which urges man to display his conscious initiative. While stress is put on bringing the conscious initiative into play, attention should be paid to the results -- this is the yardstick for measuring the conscious initiative.

VALIDITY OF 'LIU BANG'S LAST WORD CHALLENGED

HK190932 Beijing GUANGMING RIBAO in Chinese 10 Aug 82 p 3

[Text] The No 4, 1982 issue of JINYANG XUEKAN published Jiaquan's and Bibo's article entitled "Is Liu Bang's Last Word 'The Man Who Will Save Liu's Dynasty Will Surely Be Zhou Bo' a Fabrication?". Which states that there is good reason to doubt whether last word was actually said by Liu Bang.

The article says that Liu Bang was a man with a strong and inciteful character and in his lifetime, he resolutely removed all the latent political enemies that might be dangerous to his dynasty. In his later years he became aware that the Lu family clique had already fully grown and succeeded in obstructing the implementation of his policy decisions by substituting Liu Yin for Prince Ruyi of Zhao, and therefore he was unwilling to entrust the administration of the empire to his wife, Empress Lu, after his death because Lu would hurt the prince of Zhao and the prince's mother. The so-called last word conforms so well to the development of events in history that it gives us the impression that Liu Bang had such impossibly wonderful foresight into the future and even knew the details of what was to happen later. This made people doubt whether this last word was actually said by Liu Bang.

The article points out that the so-called last word was based on the fact that Liu Bang thought that Zhou Bo was "honest and steady" though Zhou lacked cultural education." However, the fact was that Zhou Bo indeed lacked cultural education but was not honest or steady. What was meant by "being honest and steady" was being honest and steady to the Liu family and loyal to the Han Dynasty. However, Zhou did not have such virtues. During the 15 years after Liu Bang's death, Zhou so allowed the Empress Dowager Lu to cruelly injure and kill the prince of Zhao and his mother. He held the post of general commander-in-chief and had the power to command a large number of troops, but instead of speaking for the interests of the Liu's family, he was the first to say, "now her majesty the empress dowager is running the country and wants to grant princedom status to her relatives. Why can she not do this?" These words provided the pretext and grounds for Lu to usurp power. All the above-mentioned facts proved that Zhou Bo was not "honest and steady," nor resolute in defending Liu's dynasty, and that the so-called last word did not conform to Liu Bang's consistent understanding of Zhou Bo's character.

The article also said something about how we should explain the historical event of removing the Lu's and defending the Liu's dynasty. It says that we should say that because of the corrupt and incompetent nature of the Lu's, the people have lost confidence in them. On the other hand, in order to safeguard unity and social stability and also their own positions, the senior statesmen and officials together killed the Lu's in accordance with the historical trend and the people's desire. That was why this event took place. It was only under this situation that Zhou Bo was selected by the senior officials to stand at the frontline in fighting against the Lu's. In fact, even if Zhou Bo did not take part in the struggle, the struggle against the Lu's was still inevitable. In short, the so-called last word that "the man who will save Liu's dynasty will surely be Zhou Bo" was fabricated by the senior officials in order to avoid punishment or slander that their loyal struggle against the Lu's might incur upon them. It was meant to be an "excuse," to justify their activities which might cause them to be regarded as being guilty of "disloyalty". When Sima Qian wrote about Liu Bang's last word, he was writing more than 70 years after Liu Bang's death, and what he wrote was based upon the historical records in the court which, as an origin, were already different from the fact. However, all the emperors who followed, whose family name was Liu, were willing to accept this last word as being true so that they could boast of being the "legitimate successors" to Liu Bang. Therefore, for so many years, no one made any profound investigation into or doubted the truth of this last word.

PARTY, STATE LEADERS AWARD TOP TEAMS, ATHLETES

[Text] Beijing, August 19 (XINHUA) -- The first Chinese national college students games closed this evening in the Great Hall of the People after 10 days.

Representing 1.2 million students from 700 universities and colleges through China, 2,255 athletes competed in track and field, rhythmic gymnastics, standard gymnastics and table tennis. The games also reviewed university-level sports in China in the past several years. Two athletes attained top Chinese levels, 106 reached first-grade standards and 1,049 reached second-grade standards.

Sports Minister Li Menghua said at the closing ceremony the top result in every event at the games will be listed as national students games records.

Chinese party and state leaders Wan Li, Xi Zhongxun, Yao Yilin, Ni Shangkun, and Zhou Peiyuan presented cups to the top teams and athletes at the closing ceremony and met with delegation leaders and representatives of athletes from across the nation.

LARGE INTEGRATED CIRCUITS TO BE SERIAL PRODUCED

[Text] Beijing, August 14 (XINHUA) -- Serial production of 30 large-scale integrated circuits, developed by Chinese scientists since 1979, is scheduled to begin soon, according to the state science and technology commission. The development of the circuits was a result of a nationwide research program on the production technique, according to the commission.

Large-scale integrated circuits are the basic units of electronic computers, which are essential for the modernization of many industries in China.

The commission also reported progress in the development of special materials and equipment needed for production of large-scale circuits. In addition, gains have been made in research on new computer processes and technology including software, and polishing without abrasives, the commission said.

As China is able to manufacture most of the 360 items necessary for large-scale circuits, the domestic need for circuits, both in quantity and quality, can be largely met, according to the commission.

China can also manufacture 42 sets of special equipment used on the lines that produce integrated circuits on silicon slices with a diameter of 50 millimeters. These slices are used in such items as electronic watches, radios, T.V. sets and computers. The computer industry also plans to develop, by 1983, the equipment needed to process integrated circuits on larger silicon slices.

ACHIEVEMENTS SCORED IN LASER SCIENCE REPORTED

[Text] Beijing, 16 Aug (XINHUA) -- China has continuously scored new achievements in the study of laser science. Laser use is becoming more and more popular in the fields of industry and medicine and other fields.

Since the emergence of the first laser device in 1961, China has succeeded in developing many laser devices and has put them to good use. In recent years, China's scientists again succeeded in developing more new laser devices.

Among such devices is the six-beam high-power neodymium glass system which shows that the technical level of China's high-power solid state laser technology has already passed the appraisal procedure and has been used in carrying out laser plasma experiments. It has enjoyed great international prestige.

China has compared its two types of highly stable helium and neon laser devices against similar products made abroad and found that these devices have already reached international advanced standards as far as stability and the rate of recurrence are concerned. The annular dye laser device, which recently passed the appraisal procedure, filled the gaps in the field of laser technology in the country while maintaining high standards. The successful development of this laser device has created a favorable condition for the study of the laser spectrum in China. At present, the continuous power output of the lateral flow electrically-driven carbon dioxide laser device developed in China has been steadily maintained at 2 kilowatts over a fairly long period. After production application, this laser device will provide a reliable means for laser use in material processing. At the same time, China has also succeeded in developing ultra-short pulse laser devices of all types, thereby opening up a new vista for the application of laser technology.

In recent years, China has also distinctly improved the quality of laser devices frequently used in the country and exerted great efforts to commercialize such devices. Many of the parts, accessories and materials developed in this connection have filled the country's gaps.

Laser use has become even more extensive in recent years. Three communication lines using light fiber have been put into experimental use separately in Beijing, Shanghai and Wuhan, and experiments have been carried out on the use of such light fiber in local telephone circuits. China has also succeeded in developing a high speed laser punch used in making jewel holes in the manufacture of clocks and watches. Lasers have been successfully used in clinical diagnosis and treatment for more than 130 types of diseases. Gratifying results have been attained in the combined use of hemotoporphyrin photosensitive drugs and lasers for the diagnosis and treatment of cancer. At present, such drugs and lasers are being used in clinical experiments after they have been tested on animals for the diagnosis and treatment of external malignant turmors, as well as cancers and tumors inside the body. Successes have also been reported in China on the painless extraction of teeth with the help of a laser, arousing great interest in the medical field abroad. Dysentery among piglets is a common and endemic disease. The departments concerned have used a carbon dioxide laser to treat such diseases, with great success.

China has done a great deal of work in basic laser research, scoring certain achievements in laser spectroscopy and nonlinear optics. Research work has also been done in some frontier sciences such as laser biology, laser chemistry and so.

SHANDONG FORUM ON LOCAL PARTY ORGANIZATIONS

SK190905 Jinan Shandong Provincial Service in Mandarin 2300 GMT 18 Aug 82

[Excerpt] The provincial forum on consolidating grassroots party organizations was held in Jinan 13-18 August. It pointed out that it is necessary to attach primary importance to ideological education and stress the reorgnaization of leading bodies in the course of consolidating grassroots party organizations.

The forum relayed and implemented the guidelines of the forum on consolidating grassroots party organizations sponsored by the organization department of the CPC Central Committee, summed up and exchanged the province's experience in carrying out the previous stage of consolidation experimental work and studied and discussed ways to do a good job in consolidating our province's grassroots party organizations. Gao Qiyun, secretary of the provincial CPC committee, spoke at the forum.

The forum held that, in consolidating grassroots party organizations, we must systematically conduct education among party members on party spirit, work style and discipline, on the communist ideology and on the party's line, principles and policies, oppose the corrosive influence of the bourgeois ideology and conduct education on the party's basic knowledge by centering on the building of the socialist spiritual and material civilizations, by using the documents of the forthcoming 12th party congress as teaching materials and by studying important documents including the resolution and the guiding principles so as to fundamentally enhance the understanding and the political consciousness and quality of party members. On this basis, we must do a good job in summing up experiences and in doing examination and appraisal work.

The meeting noted that in consolidating grassroots party organizations, we must stress the reorganization of leading bodies of grassroots party committees, general party branches and party branches in order to enhance the combat strength of party organizations.

SHANDONG IMPROVES ECONOMIC SECTOR BALANCE

[SK200322 Jinan Shandong Provincial Service in Mandarin 2300 GMT 19 Aug 82

[Text] According to our sources, since the 3d plenary session of the 11th party central committee, people throughout the province have conscientiously implemented the principle of readjusting the national economy and initially changed the serious imbalance of agriculture, light industry and heavy industry. As a result, agriculture is improving, light industry is advancing and heavy industry is gradually picking up. The provincial economy as a whole is beginning to develop steadily and soundly.

Thanks to 3 years' readjustment, our province's ratio among agriculture, light industry and heavy industry has improved remarkably. The proportion of agriculture and light industry in the output value of indsutry and agriculture as a whole increased from 60.8 percent in 1978 to 69.2 percent in 1981. Accordingly, the proportion of heavy industry dropped from 39.2 percent to 30.8 percent. The improvement of the balance among agriculture, light industry and heavy industry has enabled them to develop in a well coordinated way and to promote each other's production. Over the past 3 years, our province's total industrial and agricultural output value increased from 39.8 billion yuan in 1978 to 47.6 billion yuan in 1981, showing a yearly average increase of 6.2 percent. The yearly average increase of agriculture was 7.3 percent and that of light industry was 12.9 percent. Heavy industry has begun to pick up since the beginning of this year, and its output value has increased 7.8 percent in the first half of 1982 compared to the corresponding 1981 period.

The improvement of the balance among agriculture, light industry and heavy industry has brought the following conspicuous changes to people's economic life: The amount of agricultural sideline products and textile and light industrial products for daily use have increased greatly. More and more foodstuffs and manufactured goods for daily use have been supplied to urban and rural markets. Many daily necessities have been supplied openly and bought by the people by choice instead of supplying by coupons or in limited quantities. Now the urban and rural markets throughout the province enjoy an unprecedentedly brisk business and are becoming brisker.

More than 500,000 hectares of cropland were reported swamped.

Floods last year killed more than 1,300 people in Sichuan.

The new flooding, triggered by torrential rains that lashed Sichuan, caused the heaviest damage in the districts of Wanxian and Daxian in the east of the province. Wanxian is located on China's longest river, the Yangtze.

OPERA DEPICTING MIAO FAMILY PERFORMED IN YUNNAN

[Text] Kunming, 18 Aug (XINHUA) -- The full-length modern Beijing opera "Nadixiu," with the well-known Beijing opera performer Quan Sushuang playing the leading role, was warmly received by the audience at the recently held Yunnan provincial local and modern theatrical festival.

Depicting the fate of the family of Nidixiu, a woman of Miao nationality living on the Chinese side of the border between China and Vietnam, the opera "Nadixiu" extols the friendship cemented with the sacrifice of blood and lives between the Chinese and Vietnamese peoples in the Vietnamese people's struggle against France and the United States over the past half century. Guan Sushuang, playing the leading role as Nadixiu as she grew from a young woman to an elderly matron, did it just right. She successfully portrayed the image of a Chinese woman in a true-to-life and deeply moving manner.

The Yunnan Beijing Opera Theater, now under the direction of Quan Sushuang, has for 30 years consistently paid attention to and insisted on depicting the life and struggle of the people of various nationalities through Beijing operas to serve socialism and the people. They successively created and rearranged such modern Beijing operas as "Duoshaabo," "Ahei and Ashima," "Dainuo," "Washan Fog" and so forth, portraying images of typical characters of the Hani, Yi, Jingpo, Va, Miao and other minority nationalities. In the meantime, they have also adapted a number of relatively good modern operas of other provinces for performance in Yunnan.

GUIZHOU FORESTRY CONFERENCE -- From 4 to 10 August, the Guizhou Provincial People's Government held a conference in Guiyang on forestry. Wang Chacwen, responsible comrade of the provincial CPC committee, delivered a speech entitled: "Developing Forestry Is a Strategic Task in the Construction of the Mountainous Areas." The conference pointed out that 75 percent of the production teams throughout the province have implemented the principle of "three fixes" in forestry, namely: "Fixed rights of forests, fixed private forests and a fixed forestry production responsibility system." The conference put forth that it is necessary to implement the principle of "three fixes" in forestry from start to finish, and to vigorously afforest and protect forests. LIAONING RIBAO URGES STRAIGHTENING OUT ENTERPRISES

[Editorial: "We Must be Bold in Touching on Thorny Problems When Straightening out Enterprises"]

[Text] The whole province launched the work of straightening out industrial enterprises last February in accordance with the plans and arrangements of the CPC Central Committee and State Council; the work has continued to unfold in an all-round way and has now entered the constructive stage. A number of thorny and very difficult issues have been encountered everywhere in this work due to its many items, high demands, wide range, and strong sense of policy.

As far as Liaoning is concerned, there problems can be summed up in three aspects: First, it is difficult to rectify the leadership groups because of the many new members and changes in them and the strong sense of policy involved; second, it is hard to reduce the large number of workers, with the many aspects involved; and third, it is hard to tackle the question of the economic responsibility systems because the problems are complex, the demands high, and the foundation work poor. Whether or not we dare to touch on these thorny issues which "make a noise" when they are hit has become the key to whether the work of straightening out the enterprises can be carried out in depth.

Some comrades are apprehensive, worried and hesitant when they encounter these thorny issues. What are they worried about?

Some comrades are afraid of disorder, trouble, and adverse effects on production. Actually, the thorny problems in the enterprises exist objectively and have long been facing us. As far as certain enterprises are concerned, these problems are already serious enough, and touching on these sharp contradictions is precisely for the purpose of advancing the enterprises form "disorder" to "order." To go a step back from that, even advanced enterprises are very far from the target of becoming modern enterprises, and they too have very many problems that need solving. The experiences of certain enterprises that have dared to touch on thorny problems during their rectification work prove that the more thoroughgoing the rectification and the better that problems are solved, the higher can the quality of the enterprises and the worker force be raised, the more stable will their management situation and production order become, and the more rapidly can production develop. On the other hand, if we take a detour or retreat when encountering thorny problems, certain confusion in the enterprises will become more and more serious. Those who dare not touch on thorny problems for fear of "disorder" are in the final analysis haunted by conservative thinking, content with the status quo and lack the revolutionary spirit of forging ahead. In the course of straightening out the enterprises, we should also straighten out our thinking, catch up with the pace of the four modernizations drive, and straighten out the enterprises in accordance with the modernization demands.

Some comrades, who fear that the policies will be changed, worry that they will suffer and be the object of complaints if they act too early. It should be realized that straightening out the existing enterprises in an all-round way and comprehensively solving their problems are not just an expedient measure but a strategic policy measure formulated by the CPC Central Committee and State Council, based on the long-term development targets of socialist construction. Straightening out the enterprises and solving the thorny problems in them is not only very strongly related to currently improving economic returns, increasing revenue and bringing about a fundamental turn for the better in the national economy, but is also aimed at laying the foundations and accumulating experience for revitalizing the national economy in the future.

It is a continuation and development of the series of principles and policies laid down since the third plenary session and is in accord with our national condition. Practice has proven that the principles and policies laid down since the third plenary session are continuous and stable. The leading comrades of certain enterprises have already taken the lead and set the example by paving the way in and providing experience for straightening out the enterprises. The CPC Central Committee and the State Council have made clear-cut stipulations regarding certain specific policies in straightening out the enterprises. We should seriously act according to the central stipulations. We must not waver and hesitate any more.

There are also some comrades who are afraid of offending people. Straightening out the enterprises and solving their tough problems are in essence bound up with the workers' vital interests. Transforming the situation of bureaucratic, aging and inexpert enterprise leadership groups and the muddle of overstaffed organs, low work efficiency, lax discipline and too many hands precisely represents the desires of the workers and the trend of the times. It may be that a few comrades will be unable to think things out on certain issues, but that is only a temporary thing. The great majority of the cadres and masses support and approve straightening out the enterprises and solving the problems.

The work of straightening out the enterprises is now in full swing. The leading cadres at all levels must take part in this work with a lofty sense of the revolutionary cause and of responsibility, and apply the spirit of daring to hit tough problems so as to solve the thorny issues in the enterprises one by one and carry out in depth the work of straightening out the enterprises.

LEGISLATORS ISSUE JOINT STATEMENT ON U.S. TRIP

OW200554 Taipei CHENG CHIH CHIA in Chinese 16 Aug 82 p 5

[Joint statement by Kang Ning-hsiang, Chang Te-ming and Huang Huang-hsiung, members of the Legislative Yuan, and Yu Ching, member of the Control Yuan]

[Text] At the invitation of the Taiwanese professors' association in North America, we four visited the United States and Japan for 40 days. During the visit, we had wide contact with the personnel concerned of U.S. Congress, the State Department, the Defense Department and the National Security Council, as well as Asia experts, fellow Taiwanese residing in the United States and the personnel concerned of Japanese political and economic affairs departments, and held penetrating discussions with them on the international situation and the China question. Here, we wish to put forward the following views before personages of various circles:

1. At a time when the discussion on the Taiwant question between the United States and the Chinese Communists entered a sensitive stage, we firmly stated to U.S. Government officials concerned that the wishes and decision of the 18 million people on Taiwan must be respected in determining the future of Taiwan. During our visit to Japan, we also made the same representation to Japanese officials concerned.

2. On the question of arms sales, we clearly stated to American personages concerned that the United States should continue to provide us with defensive weapons for the survival and security of Taiwan, as well as for peace, security and stability in the western Pacific.

3. Our fellow Taiwanese residing in the United States have done very well in society. We are particularly touched by their great concern for the native land. We should adopt positive measures to make use of such valuable human resources so that they will become an important force in national construction.

4. Human rights and security supplement each other, and one should not stress security to the neglect of human rights. Only wide and vigorous support from our compatriots at home and abroad is the main guarantee for national security. From now on there should be greater respect for human rights for the sake of national security.

5. This trip has enabled us to realize more profoundly that our future depends on the practice of democracy. Only by stepping up the practice of democracy will we be able to strengthen internal unity and achieve greater social stability and economic prosperity. Therefore, all people should take an active part in the practice of democracy and the government should have greater sincerity in this regard.

GOVERNMENT REACTIONS TO U.S.-PRC COMMUNIQUE

Vice Foreign Minister

OW191802 Taipei CNA in English 1508 GMT 19 Aug 82

[Text] Taipei, Aug 19 (CNA) -- Vice Foreign Minister Fredrick Chien said Thursday the Republic of China Government had kept close contact with the United States Government during the past 10 months.

The ROC had consistently expressed its opposition to the Washington-Peiping negotiations which climaxed in the joint communique of Aug. 17, Chien said. In a interview with the Chinese Television Company, Chien said that beginning last October, the Peiping regime forcefully asked the U.S. to stop selling arms to Taipei. From the very start, the Government of the ROC formally notified the U.S. that the arms sales are not negotiable, because the Taiwan Relations Act clearly states a commitment to sell what it needed. The U.S. Government, however, continued the talks after thinking over possible influences on its internal policy, he pointed out. Because of the Chinese [words indistinct] gave this nation several concrete assurances. [Word indistinct] points of assurance were given July 14 to the ROC Government, Chien said.

The ROC Government will closely watch future developments as the six points are not totally satisfactory, Chien added.

Assemblymen's Resolution

OW200400 Taipei CNA in English 0243 GMT 20 Aug 82

[Text] Taipei, Aug. 20 (CNA) -- The National Assembly Thursday expressed support for the government's stance on Sino-U.S. relations. The assemblymen expressed deep regret over the newly issued Washington-Peiping joint communique which intends to restrict future U.S. arms sales to the Republic of China.

In a joint committee meeting Thursday, the assemblymen adopted a resolution proclaiming:

-- The government of the Republic of China is the sole legal government of China. The Peiping regime is a rebellious group, which has no right to represent the Chinese people. Thus, any agreement between the United States and Peiping regime will be null and void.

-- The newly issued Washington-Peiping joint communique which intends to limit U.S. arms sales to ROC violates the Taiwan Relations Act.

-- The Peiping regime has never abandoned its final goal of communizing Taiwan militarily. We hope the U.S. Government will see clearly the aggressive nature of the Chinese Communists and will fully implement the taiwan Relations Act and continue to provide ROC with adequate arms.

The assemblymen called on all compatriots at home and abroad to unite solidly and support government policy of national recovery.

TA KUNG PAO ON SINO-U.S. COMMUNIQUE, U.S. DEEDS

HK190929 Hong Kong TA KUNG PAO in Chinese 19 Aug 82 p 1

[Text] The United States Recognizes China's Consistent Stand

In the joint communique issued by the Governments of China and the United States, one can find a sentence which President Ronald Reagan wrote in his letter to Vice-Chairman Deng Xiaoping in April, that is, the United States recognizes China's consistent stand on the issue of U.S. arms sales to Taiwan.

This letter was sent on 5 April. One week later, Reagan submitted to Congress the decision on selling arms worth $60 million to Taiwan. China has never disclosed any details of this letter. It is the U.S. side which published this letter together with Reagan's two letters to Chairman Hu Yaobang and Premier Zhao Ziyang when Vice President Bush of the United States visited China in May.

As this sentence has once again been written in the joint communique, it should be considered as a principled guarantee offered by the U.S. side.

There Should Be a Definite Time Limit for U.S. Arms Sales to Taiwan

Beijing has made clear China's consistent stand on this issue.

Taiwan is part of China's sovereign territory. There is only one China, that is, the People's Republic of China. U.S. arms sales to Taiwan violate its own guarantee of not creating "two Chinas' or "one China, one Taiwan" as offered in the Shanghai Communique and the communique on the establishment of diplomatic relations between China and the United States.

Taking into account the historical factors, China has agreed that the United States may continue to sell arms to Taiwan for a certain period of time, but must not exceed the previous level either in qualitative or in quantitative terms.

What is more important is that there must be a definite time limit on this issue, and the United States must give a clear and definite indication.

There Is Much Flexibility in the Three Steps

During the 10-month negotiation before the issuance of the joint communique, it was difficult to reach an agreement on the issue of U.S. arms sales to Taiwan and the United States was unwilling to undertake any obligation for a final settlement.

This time, however, the U.S. Government declared in the joint communique that it "does not seek to carry out a long-term policy of arms sales to Taiwan." In other words, that really means "the termination of arms sales."

It is on the basis of this principle that three steps were arranged, namely the three commitments of the United States. The first commitment is that the U.S. arms sales to Taiwan will not exceed, either in qualitative or in quantitative terms, the level of those supplied in recent years since the establishment of diplomatic relations between the United States and China. The second commitment is that the supply will be reduced gradually and the third is that a final resolution will be achieved after a period of time.

IT must be admitted that there is much flexibility in these three steps. How soon does the word "gradually" mean? And what is the exact length of "a period of time?" It all depends on how the steps are taken.

The Crux Lies in the "Taiwan Relations Act"

The promulgation of the three steps is a powerful blow to the Taiwan authorities who have depended on the United States all along. What deserves our attention, however, is whether or not the United States will adopt double-dealing tactics in the future.

U.S. arms sales to Taiwan is only part of the U.S. execution of the "Taiwan Relations Act." The joint communique has resolved the arms issue only and it is just the beginning of the settlement. After the issuance of the joint communique, both China and the United States still have their own opinions on the prime issue of the "Taiwan Relations Act."

China holds that the issues enumerated in the joint communique should have nothing to do with the "Taiwan Relations Act." But the statement of President Reagan of the United States and the speech of Senator Percy, chairman of the U.S. Foreign Relations Committee, have insisted on linking them together.

A crisis of retrogression in Sino-U.S. relations has been averted. Nevertheless, whether they will continue to advance depends on whether and how the United States executes the agreement.

PRC APPROVES NUCLEAR VENTURE WITH HONG KONG

[Text] Beijing has approved the construction of a nuclear power plant in Guangdong which will supply electricity to Hong Kong, a vice-governor of the province said yesterday,

Reports reaching Hong Kong said Mr Liang Weilin revealed that the project would go ahead after a meeting between top Guangdong officials and the Hong Kong governor, Sir Edward Youde, who is on a two-day official visit in Guangzhou and Shenzhen.

Speaking to reporters after the meeting, Mr Liang said the governor was told of the decision when he asked if Canton had enough electricity.

Sir Edward was told that the State Council had recently given the green light to build the nuclear plant somewhere between Ta Ya Wan and Mirs Bay -- a peninsula northeast of Hong Kong.

The news has, however, taken both China Light and Power Co and the Hong Kong Government by surprise.

A spokesman for China Light said it had not received any "information or notification" from China on the proposed joint venture between his company and the Guangdong Power Co.

Joint negotiations between the two companies have been underway for many months.

A senior Hong Kong Government official yesterday said the government had no knowledge that approval for the project had been given by Beijing.

"It's very exciting news. I am trying to check this," he said.

However, the official said there were indications at a recent meeting between the two power companies that the parties were "willing in principle" to enter into a joint venture.

But no written agreement was signed during the meeting which was attended by representatives of the two companies about a month ago.

It is understood that the major consideration for Chinese officials is the financial commitment that they will have to shoulder for the venture because all equipment will have to be imported from overseas and paid for in hard currency.

Another problem could be that the electricity eventually supplied by the plant to Hong Kong could not be charged at a rate higher than local consumers are paying at the moment.

Sir Edward was greeted by top Guangdong officials at White Cloud Airport yesterday when he and his entourage disembarked from the CAAC flight -- which was slightly delayed because of a heavy downpour in Guangzhou.

The governor would not answer reporters' questions at Kai Tak Airport, but it is understood he will give a press briefing at the end of his visit later today.

He had a meeting with Guangdong's governor, Mr Liu Tianfu, and other top Guangdong officials yesterday afternoon after which he visited three hotel sites under construction aided by Hong Kong investment.

He attended an official banquet in the evening hosted in his honour by Mr Liu.

At the dinner, Mr Liu was told about concern expressed by local people on the proximity of the power plant to Hong Kong.

Mr Liu said he did not believe that the plant would do any harm to Hong Kong. "It will only bring benefit," he said.

Today, Sir Edward will go by train to Shenzhen where he will visit the special economic zone in Shekou, several factories and the Shenzhen reservoir. It is Sir Edward's first official visit since he took up his post.

The governor and Lady Youde are being accompanied by the acting political adviser, Mr Richard Margolis, and the chief government interpreter, Mr Y.P. Cheng.

The power news came to light on the same day as Beijing announced that plans for another nuclear power station, a 300-megawatt pressurised water reactor, are at an advanced state.

The WORKERS DAILY [GUANGMING RIBAO] said the research and design stage was almost over and environmental tests had been completed.

Diplomatic sources said the reactor would be built near Shanghai and would use Chinese-produced equipment for the core and other key parts.

They said construction was apparently at an early stage but it would be many years before it began to generate power.

Further Details

[By Christine Leung]

[Text] China's State Council has given the go-ahead for plans to build a nuclear power station near Hong Kong, the Governor Sir Edward Youde was told yesterday.

But Chinese officials said that no date had been fixed for work to start on the joint-venture power station, to be sited between Mrs Bay and Taya Bay.

Sir Edward was told that the power station, the fruit of a partnership between China Light and Power Company and the Guangdong power authorities, would supply electricity to Hong Kong as well as China.

The governor of Guangdong, Liu Tianfu, described the plant as "beneficial" to Hong Kong people, and said they had nothing to fear from it.

He said there was no need for Hong Kong people to worry about the plant because it would be "very far away."

But he did not specify the exact location of the plant.

"We are still discussing the project with French and British experts," he told reporters on his way to a banquet with Sir Edward in the evening.

Chinese officials refused to offer any further comment on the subject, but the party secretary of Guangdong Province, Ren Zhongyi, confirmed that "a decision has been made."

Approval was also announced for plans to improve transport links between Hong Kong and Shenzhen, to cater for the growing traffic between the colony and the neighbouring special economic zone.

It was decided that two or three new bridges should be built to facilitate the expected increase in cross-border transport.

The decision was discussed between Hong Kong Governor Sir Edward Youde and senior Guangdong officials in two meetings held in Guangzhou yesterday.

The two teams of Chinese officials were headed by party secretary of Guangdong Province Ren Zhongyi and the governor of Guangdong, Liu Tianfu, separately.

China officials also told Sir Edward that Guangdong Province would continue an "open door" policy to foreign investment and it would remain stable.

Both parties discussed the development of the special economic zone, which was described as a benefit to both Shenzhen and Hong Kong.

It was learned that the building of a highway between Hong Kong and Guangzhou was also mentioned in the meeting. China officials told Sir Edward that speedy construction of the highway would vastly help the development of the province.

And as economic prosperity in both Guangdong and Hong Kong would benefit both places, there was a need to further develop trade between them.

It was also learned that Sir Edward was briefed on industrial and agricultural developments in Guangdong, and told that despite recent floods there the province had still increased output.

Sir Edward also showed great interest in the basic economic structure of Guangdong.

Governor of Guangdong Mr Liu described the meeting with the Hong Kong governor as "a very good one".

He said cooperation and economic issues between the two places had been discussed and that problems -- some of which had already been solved -- were also talked about.

Sir Edward however declined to give any details of the two meetings, saying that a press briefing would be given after his trip this afternoon at Mankamto.

Sir Edward told Mr Liu before the meeting in a press photographic session that he had been to Guangzhou three times but this was his first official visit as the governor of Hong Kong.

He spoke in Putonghua in casual chats with Chinese officials and Mr Liu described him as an "old friend of China".

The governor arrived at Guangzhou's Baiyun Airport at 12.35 noon yesterday; the heavy rain in the city turned to drizzle which stopped in the afternoon during Sir Edward's visit.

After his first meeting with Guangdong Governor Mr Liu, Sir Edward was escorted by the vice governor of Guangdongm Liang Weilin, to briefly tour three Hong Kong financed hotel projects in Guangzhou.

The three hotels are the Garden Hotel, Grand Hotel of China and White Swan Hotel.

TA KUNG PAO Interview

[Text] Before attending a banquet this evening, Governor Liu Tianfu of Guangdong Province held a brief dialogue with correspondents as follows:

Reporter: Will you say something about your meeting with the governor of Hong Kong today?

Liu Tianfu: Today's meeting was excellent.

Reporter: Can you disclose what was discussed in the meeting?

Liu: Both sides spoke of the prospects for cooperation between Guangdong and Hong Kong, but mainly cooperation in the economic and communications fields.

Reporter: Does the communications refer to Man Kam To?

Liu: Yes, we talked about the communications in Shenzhen, and some of the problems have already been solved.

Reporter: Did you discuss the Guangdong-Hong Kong-Macao speed highway?

Liu: No, we didn't touch on that issue today.

Reporter: What about the building of a nuclear power station?

Liu: We are now holding talks with foreigners on this issue.

Reporter: Foreigners of what countries?

Liu: Britain, France and others.

Reporter: Some people in Hong Kong take objection to the building of a nuclear power station. What do you think of it?

Liu: Against what? This has nothing to do with Hong Kong. Anyway, there will be no harm, but benefits from Hong Kong.

Reporter: However, some people hold that there will be danger because the location of the nuclear power station is very close to Hong Kong.

Liu: Don't worry about it. The location is a long way from Hong Kong.

Earlier, Vice Governor Liang Weilin of Guangdong Province also answered some questions from correspondents after his meeting with Governor Sir Edward Youde. The following is the dialogue:

Reporter: Did you discuss the problem of building a nuclear power station during your meeting today with the Hong Kong governor?

Liang Weilin: Yes, we did.

Reporter: Was any decision made on the problem?

Liang: Yes. For the most part the problem has been settled. We are prepared to build a nuclear power station within Guangdong Province in cooperation with China Light and Power Company.

Reporter: When was the relevant decision made?

Liang: It was decided earlier.

Reporter: Where will the location of the station be?

Liang: It will be between Dapeng Bay [Mirs Bay] and Daya Bay of Shenzhen.

Reporter: When will its construction work start?

Liang: The exact date has not yet been fixed.

Reporter: How was the decision mentioned to the Hong Kong governor during your meeting with him?

Liang: The governor asked us if there is sufficient electricity for us. We told him there is not enough, however, we have decided to build up a nuclear power station within Guangdong Province in cooperation with China Light and Power Company. The station, when accomplished, will supply electricity not only for Guangdong provincial and other parts of China, but also for Hong Kong.

Reporter: Besides the afore-said problem, what else is the governor interested in mostly?

Liang: He is very interested in the economic situation in Guangdong Province, including industry, agriculture and trade.

MING PAO REPORTS PRC COMMUNE STRUCTURE CHANGES

HK180752 Hong Kong MING PAO in Chinese 18 Aug 82 p 6

[Special dispatch from Beijing: "Two Forms of Separating Government Administration From Commune Management: The Name 'Commune' May Be Abolished"]

[Text] The rural people's commune system that "combines administrative and economic functions into one organization" was one of the "great creations" during the time when Mao Zedong ruled China. This system is unable to perform the function of a basic administrative organization, but it enables people to abuse their economic management power.

As a result, the so-called advantage in "being first, a big collective and second, publicly owned" has turned out to be "first, egalitarianism and second, gratuitous transference of assets" (egalitarian distribution and gratuitous transference of labor, materials and goods). More than 20 years of practice has proved that this system has brought more evils than benefits, harmed the peasants' initiative, blocked the development of the rural economy and had a harmful effect on the livelihood of both urban and rural people. That is why clause 98 and clause 103 in chapter 3 of the draft of the revised constitution provide the establishment, respectively, of township governments and township committees and thus formulate the principle of separating government administration from commune management. Now tests are being conducted under a unified plan in varous provinces, cities and autonomous regions to explore for a feasible way to separate government administration from commune management.

This reporter has learned that the legislative affairs commission of the NPC Standing Committee recently completed a sample investigation report and has put forth some tentative suggestions for separating government administration from economic management of rural people's communes. This investigation report was written on the basis of interviewing 92 rural households and some of the cadres of the CPC committees and relevant departments in 8 provinces, cities and autonomous regions, 19 prefectures (including autonomous and municipal prefectures), 24 counties, 35 communes and 30 brigades, which were selected as samples. The report suggests the following two schemes to separate government administration from communes.

The first is a "Guangan-type" structure (Guangan is a county in Sichuan) whereby government administration is separated from the commune and township CPC committees, township governments and agricultural, industrial and commercial complex companies are to be established, basic accounting units and production teams will be changed into agricultural production cooperatives and brigade-level economic organizations will be abolished. The commune and brigade enterprises will be changed into enterprises that are jointly run by various productive cooperatives and the production and circulation of various trades including agriculture, industry and commerce will be organized by the agricultural, industrial and commercial complex company by economic means. Village governments will be set up at the original brigade level and will carry out their work under the leadership of the township governments.

The second is to establish, in addition, township CPC committees and township governments and retain people's communes as economic entities. The three-level economic structure will remain unchanged and at the same time, transbrigade, transcommune and transcountry joint economic organizations will be established. This is the scheme that will be adopted by most areas in our country.

In regard to the scale of the township governments, the investigation report results indicate that a county will be divided into districts which cover the same area as the existing communes. In each district, a district government will be established as the government institution that the county government sends to the district. This is one scheme. Another scheme is that a village government will be set up in each of the original administrative villages which has been turned into an existing brigade. In some southern areas where the villages are big, a township government will be established in each village. The population of a township will be more than 1,000 people, and will be allowed to reach 2,000 or 3,000 people, and should not exceed 5,000. A second scheme for the scale of the township government is that a township will be established in a few brigades, and if the commune is small and concentrated, one township will be established in the commune. No matter what scheme is selected, there will be a unified form of administrative structure. Whether or not the economic organizations will continue to be called people's communes will be decided in the light of the actual conditions and the desires of the masses of people.

UN SECRETARY GENERAL HOLDS TALKS WITH OFFICIALS

Meets With Huang Hua

OW201620 Beijing XINHUA in English 1557 GMT 20 Aug 82

[Text] Beijing, August 20 (XINHUA) -- Chinese State Councillor and Foreign Minister Huang Hua held two rounds of talks here today with U.N. Secretary-General Javier Perez de Cuellar. Sources said they exchanged views on Kampuchea, Afghanistan, the Middle East, Namibia, global negotiations and other issues. They agreed the U.N. should play a greater role in safeguarding world peace and promoting international cooperation.

Huang Hua stated the Chinese Government's general policy on foreign affairs. "The basic points of our foreign policy are unity with Third-World countries and peoples, alliance with those countries and peoples who cherish peace and uphold justice, opposition to hegemonism in defence of world peace no matter what direction such hegemonism comes from. China will never cling to any superpower. China will never play the "U.S. card" against the Soviet Union, nor the "Soviet card" against the United States. We will also not allow anyone to play the "Chinese card," he said.

Huang Hua said: "China is willing to develop relations with any country on the basis of the five principles of peaceful coexistence. Having won her independence, China never imposes on other countries the bitter experience of having been bullied for a long time. China solemnly declares she will never seek hegemony, even when she becomes powerful."

The foreign minister explained his government's stand on solution of the Kampuchean issue. "The establishment of a coalition government for Democratic Kampuchea by three resistance forces marks a new stage of the Kampuchean people's resistance to Vietnamese aggression. At present there are hopes the issue can be solved politically. However, prior to the withdrawal of Vietnamese troops from Kampuchea, the conditions do not exist for a political solution. ASEAN recently exposed Vietnam's fraud of partial troop withdrawal, refusing its proposal to call an international meeting on the Southeast Asian issue. We hope the forthcoming session of the U.N. General Assembly will adopt an appropriate resolution when it discusses the Kampuchean question, continuing to pressure Vietnam to completely withdraw its troops," he said.

"The key to solving the Afghanistan issue lies in the withdrawal of Soviet troops first," he said.

Referring to the role of the U.N., Huang Hua said: "The Third World is a vital political force which is a pillar of the U.N. The U.N. should take greater consideration of the reasonable demands of the Third World and defend the legitimate rights and interests of these countries." He pledged China's greater cooperation with the U.N.

Perez de Cuellar told Huang Hua how the U.N. has mediated international disputes since he assumed the office of secretary-general. "We should make further efforts to play truly the role of prevention of calamity. It's a pity some big countries are acting contrary to the spirit of the U.N. Charter," he said.

Speaking on the Kampuchean and Afghanistan issues, he demanded Vietnam and the Soviet Union respect the relevent U.N. resolutions and withdraw their troops.

On the Middle East, he said withdrawal of the Palestine Liberation Organization from west Beirut does not mean the Middle East issue is solved. He hoped to see an overall solution. "The U.N. is the right place to solve this question," he said.

On the Lebanese situation after the P.L.O. and foreign troops are withdrawn, he said: "If a civil war breaks out in Lebanon, Israel will make use of it."

Perez de Cuellar thanked the Chinese Government for its support to the U.N. "China and the other Third-World countries are playing an increasingly important role in the United Nations," he said.

Present for the U.N. were Bi Jilong, U.N. under-secretary-general, and Raffeeuddin Ahmed, special representative of the secretary-general for humanitarian affairs in Southeast Asia.

The Chinese side were represented by Vice-Minister of Foreign Affairs Zhang Wenjin, and permanent representative of China to the U.N. Ling Qing.

OW201636 Beijing XINHUA in English 1616 GMT 20 Aug 82

[Text] Beijing, August 20 (XINHUA) -- Chinese State Councillor and Foreign Minister Huang Hua gave a banquet in honor of U.N. Secretary-General Javier Perez de Cuellar and his party in the Great Hall of the People here this evening. In his speech, Huang Hua said: With the firm and unremitting support of the Third-World countries Perez de Cuellar was elected to the important post of the secretary-general of the United Nations over half a year ago. "China and the other Third-World countries highly appreciate the unremitting efforts made by the secretary-general to safeguard world peace and promote economic and social development, and sincerely wish him success in performing the important mission entrusted to him by all member states of the United Nations," he said.

Huang Hua said, the United Nations Charter has entrusted the United Nations with the noble task to maintain world peace and security, curb acts of aggression and other breaches of international peace, ensure that the sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence of all countries are not encroached upon and develop international cooperation based on equality.

"Rivalry between the two superpowers remains the major source of instability and turbulence in the world," he said. "One superpower and the regional hegemonists it supports have up to this day refused to withdraw their fo[illegible] of aggression in compliance with the relevant resolutions of the United Natio[illegible] Afghan and Kampuchean peoples are still suffering from the atrocities and slaughter[illegible] committed by the aggressors."

Huang Hua said: "With the connivance and backing of the other superpower, the Israeli authorities, in total disregard of the numerous resolutions adopted by the U.N. General Assembly and the Security Council, have launched frenzied armed invasion of Lebanon, brutally massacring the Palestinian and Lebanese peoples."

"Faced with such a situation," he said, "the justice-upholding countries and peoples as well as fair-minded public opinion in the world demand that the United Nations take resolute actions against the aggressors. Severe sanctions should be imposed on the unscrupulous Israeli authorities in order to uphold justice and the dignity of the United Nations Charter."

Speaking of international economic relations, Huang Hua said: "The United Nations is also entrusted with increasingly important responsibilities in the economic and social fields. At present, the world is faced with a grim economic situation and the North-South dialogue is at a deadlock.

To break the deadlock so as to bring about an early start of global negotiations will be conducive to reforming the old international economic relations and improving the world economic situation. The crux of the matter now lies in the vision and sincere desire of some developed countries.

Perez de Cuellar said, since the second special session of the General Assembly on disarmament, the resort to force in the Middle East has assumed new dimensions bringing with it enormous suffering and loss of life. Stability in other regions in this short period has also become more fragile. The second special session ended without agreement which might have offered hope of early progress on a comprehensive approach to disarmament.

"Under these difficult circumstances," he said, "we are called on, I believe, to examine most seriously the role of the United Nations which was established, after all, with the specific purposes of preventing war, of facilitating the peaceful settlement of disputes and of encouraging international co-operation."

The U.N. secretary-general said: "The United Nations is an instrumentality which can be used effectively for this purpose if it has the support of member states, especially of the five permanent members who, under the charter, have a special responsibility for the preservation of peace. This is a basic requirement if the purposes of the United Nations are to be met."

"It is also essential that member states place reliance in the capacity of the United Nations to resolve disputes and to keep the peace and in the objectivity with which it can perform these essential functions," he said.

Referring to global negotiations, the U.N. secretary-general said the forthcoming session of the General Assembly will offer a further opportunity to reach an understanding on negotiations to improve the global economic order. He expressed appreciation for China's active and constructive interest in the United Nations. "China's participation in the broad range of United Nations programs is of ever more significance," he added.

Also present at the banquet were Chinese Vice-Minister of Foreign Affairs Zhang Wenjin, China's permanent representative to the United Nations Ling Qing, resident co-ordinator of the United Nations Systems Operational Activities for Development Nessim Shallon and diplomatic envoys of a number of countries to China.

Meets With Deng Xiaoping

OW211256 Beijing XINHUA in English 1241 GMT 21 Aug 82

[Text] Beijing, August 21 (XINHUA) -- Deng Xiaoping, vice-chairman of the Chinese Communist Party Central Committee, reiterated China's foreign policy during his meeting with U.N. Secretary-General Javier Perez de Cuellar and his party here this morning. He said: "China is aware of her own duty. China is under-developed with a large population, but she is reliable for two things. One is China keeps to principles. The other is what she says counts. She never plays with politics or words, nor does she play cards. As a member of the Third World, China will further strengthen her unity and cooperation with the other Third-World countries in a common fight against hegemonism in defence of world peace."

Deng pointed out: "When the superpowers are out seeking hegemony, the Third-World countries are the first to suffer.

"Since World War II, no major wars have broken out, but there has been no stopping of minor wars. As a matter of fact, there is no peace to talk about. The root cause lies in the superpowers sowing discord, interfering and contending for hegemony. As a main force in opposing hegemonism, the Third-World countries will carry an ever-increasing weight in international politics. This is something nobody should neglect. The days are gone forever when the superpowers could manipulate the destiny of the world people."

Deng praised Perez de Cuellar for his efforts in safeguarding world peace and promoting international cooperation since he became the U.N. secretary-general. "Great changes have taken place in the composition of the United Nations. It is hoped that the United Nations will play a more important role," he said.

Perez de Cuellar said: "China is an important member of the United Nations and her seat in the U.N. Security Council represents the Third World. China's actions in the Security Council prove she is able to defend the interests of the Third World. China is loyal to the U.N. policy of peace and abides by the principles of the U.N. Charter. All this fills us with greater confidence."

He said: "The international tension we are facing is mainly due to some member states of the U.N. making light of the U.N. Charter and refusing to carry out U.N. resolutions."

Vice-Minister of Foreign Affairs Zhang Wenjin and China's permanent representative to the U.N. Ling Qing were present at the meeting.

Feted by Zhao Ziyang

OW211314 Beijing XINHUA in English 1304 GMT 21 Aug 82

[Text] Beijing, August 21 (XINHUA) -- Chinese Premier Zhao Ziyang met and had a friendly talk with U.N. Secretary-General Javier Perez de Cuellar and his party at the state guesthouse this morning. He said "it is a great change that Third-World countries now make up more than two-thirds of the membership of the United Nations. As an important political force, the Third World has played a great role on the international stage. Thus, the period in which the United Nations has been manipulated by superpowers has passed."

He hoped the United Nations would play an active role in safeguarding the rights and interests of the Third-World countries. He also expressed the belief that China and the U.N. would have better cooperation.

The U.N. secretary-general said "through my talks with Chinese leaders, I am pleased to see the principles of China's foreign policy and the spirit of the U.N. Charter are synonymous. China has set a very good example for the Third-World countries."

He said "the U.N. can play its role in settling conflicts and issues among developing countries, so as to prevent big power meddling." After the meeting, Zhao Ziyang gave a luncheon for the secretary-general.

Lauds PRC Foreign Policy

OW211536 Beijing XINHUA in English 1502 GMT 21 Aug 82

[Text] Beijing, August 21 (XINHUA) -- U.N. Secretary-General Perez de Cuellar told a press conference here today that he found China's foreign policy very much in accordance with U.N. Charter and principles after his comprehensive talks with Chinese leaders. He said China has shown great interest in using the United Nations to solve international issues. "China is interested in peace and in peaceful solution to international issues," he said.

He said Chinese leaders told him China is a member of the Third World but she doesn't want to be leader of the Third World. The secretary-general said the United Nations is a real efficient instrument, but some big powers do not use the instrument in a proper way.

He also answered questions about U.N. involvement in the Middle East, Kampuchea and other international issues. Perez de Cuellar and other high-ranking U.N. officials are scheduled to leave Beijing for Shanghai tomorrow.

UN MEETING ON INDIAN OCEAN PEACE ZONE NOT SET

[Text] Geneva, August 20 (XINHUA) -- The 45 member states of the U.N. ad hoc committee on the Indian Ocean could not agree on a date for a U.N. conference on the implementation of the declaration of the Indian Ocean as a peace zone. The three-week committee meeting which ended here today was held in preparation for such a conference.

The differences of opinion center on priorities. The delegates of Western countries held that the political and security climate in the Indian Ocean has deteriorated in the last eleven years since the declaration of the Indian Ocean a zone of peace was adopted by the U.N. General Assembly in 1971, especially following the massive military build-up of the Soviet Union in the region and its invasion and occupation of Afghanistan, a hinterland state of the Indian Ocean. Therefore, in their view, the ad hoc committee must first of all deal with such substantial issues as Afghanistan and achieve the "harmonization of views" on these issues before embarking on the concrete organizational preparations for a full U.N. conference.

The non-aligned states, represented by Sri Lanka, while recognizing the deteriorated situation in the region as a result of the rivalry between the two superpowers, the foreign military presence, and especially the Soviet Union's armed invasion of Afghanistan, viewed that such worsened political and security climate should not impede the earlier convocation of a U.N. conference aimed at establishing the Indian Ocean a zone of peace. Therefore, they proposed that the conference be held in Colombo in May 1983.

The delegate of China was of the opinion that the ad hoc committee and the would-be conference as well should devote themselves to the thorough-going discussions of such substantial issues as the Soviet armed invasion of Afghanistan, the rivalry between the two superpowers for hegemony and the foreign military presence in the region, the root causes for the deterioration of the situation in the region. At the same time, China also supported the proposal of the U.N. conference on the establishment of the Indian Ocean a zone of peace.

The Soviet Union, in appearance, "supported" the proposal of non-aligned states on the earlier convocation of the conference. But in essence, it attempted to escape from the international condemnation of its armed occupation of Afghanistan and massive military build-up in the region, and tried to make the declaration of the Indian Ocean a zone of peace an empty paper without any substantial contents.

As no agreement was reached at the ad hoc committee meeting, the committee decided that another meeting be held in New York next September or October during the U.N. General Assembly.

U.S. OFFICIALS SAID TO DISTORT COMMUNIQUE

[Text] Beijing, August 20 (XINHUA) -- High-ranking government officials of the United States briefed the press and Congress on the China-U.S. joint communique soon after its publication. In their talks, they stressed on the one hand the importance of developing U.S.-China relations, considering the communique as a vital step forward in solving the differences between China and the United States on the issue of U.S. arms sales to Taiwan. On the other hand, however, they made distorted interpretations of certain contents in the communique.

Speaking before the Senate Foreign Affairs Committee Tuesday, U.S. Assistant Secretary of State for East Asia and Pacific Affairs John Holdridge pointed to the need of preserving and advancing relations between the United States and China. This, he said, is "a fundamental national interest of the United States." But, on articles in the communique concerning U.S. arms sales to Taiwan, he made distorted interpretations of some of them, underscoring that "as a matter of fact and law, any adjustments in our arms sales to Taiwan had to be premised on a continuation of China's peaceful policy (towards Taiwan)."

He also said: "Our guiding principle is now and will continue to be that embodied in the Taiwan Relations Act -- the maintenance of a self-defense capability sufficient to meet the military needs of Taiwan...."

Here, it should be pointed out once again that U.S. arms sales to Taiwan and China's efforts for peaceful resolution of the Taiwan issue are two separate questions of an entirely different nature. In what way the Taiwan issue is to be resolved is purely an internal affair of China, brooking no external interference. In the communique, the Chinese Government reiterates its policy of striving to resolve the Taiwan issue peacefully and its stand that the Taiwan issue is China's internal affair. This can in no way be explained as any commitments China made to the United States, and any misrepresentation of a U.S. stop to arms sales to Taiwan as having to be premised by peaceful resolution of the Taiwan issue will be a continued, premeditated interference in China's internal affairs. As for the "Taiwan Relations Act," which was unilaterally introduced by the United States, it not only constitutes a grave violation of the commitment the U.S. Government made at the time when relations between the United States and China were normalized and of the principles in the related China-U.S. communique, it also runs counter to the fundamental norms in international relations.

On the same day, a U.S. senior official made a speech similar to that of John Holdridge mentioned above at a background briefing on the China-U.S. joint communique. The official even described the U.S. recognition of an important principle in the joint communique on the establishment of diplomatic relations between the United States and China, i.e., that there is but one China, Taiwan is part of China and the Government of the People's Republic of China is the sole legal government of China, as only a U.S. acknowledgement of the Chinese position on this issue. "But we don't take any particular stand of our own with respect to it," he said.

Referring to the arms sale to Taiwan, the official distorted the statement in the communique that "it (the United States) intends gradually to reduce its sale of arms to Taiwan, leading, over a period of time, to a final resolution," by saying that "the statements of future U.S. arms sales policy embodied in the communique do not provide either a time frame for reductions of U.S. arms sales or for their termination." By saying so, he attempted to evade U.S. responsibilities.

These statements of U.S. officials, obviously, go against the principle that the U.S. side "has no intention of infringing on Chinese sovereignty...or interfering in China's internal affairs," and the U.S. commitment to the issue of arms sale to Taiwan, namely, against the principle and commitment the U.S. Government declared in the China-U.S. joint communique.

SOME RIGHTIST CONGRESSMEN DENOUNCE COMMUNIQUE

[Text] Washington, August 22 (XINHUA) -- Some rightist congressmen of the United States have attacked the China-U.S. joint communique on the settlement of the issue of U.S. arms sales to Taiwan in an attempt to negate it and undermine Sino-U.S. relations.

Senator Barry Goldwater of Arizona was reported to have labeled the communique as "a bad agreement." He said that the communique has imposed quantitative and qualitative restrictions on the future U.S. arms sales to Taiwan. This, he said, is in essence a violation of the "Taiwan Relations Act". A small number of U.S. conservative senators also vented their discontent with the communique at a Senate Foreign Relations Committee hearing on August 17.

Senator John Glenn, an Ohio Democrat and one of the drafters of the "Taiwan Relations Act," which interferes in China's internal affairs, complained at the meeting that President Reagan has made too many concessions, thus putting them in an "unfortunate position", an "impossible position." He held that the limitations announced in the agreement reached in the China-U.S. joint communique are "a violation of the spirit of the Taiwan Relations Act."

He complained that when they put forward the act (the "Taiwan Relations Act") at that time, they intended to resist China's pressure aimed at limiting U.S. arms sales to Taiwan. However, the present communique has given up the U.S. commitment.

"We apparently have given in to China," said Glenn in a CBS TV program. He said the communique amounts to the United States eventually renouncing its commitment "to take care of Taiwan's defense needs."

Senator Jesse Helms of North Carolina said the issuance of the communique was, in the eyes of Taiwan, another defeat for them. He stuck to the idea of "two Chinas", saying that it is unprecedented in the history of the United States that "a third country" is allowed to dictate U.S. relationship with Taiwan.

On August 19 a few U.S. congressmen held a press conference in a meeting room on the Capitol Hill which was attended by less than 20 people, to voice their opposition to the joint communique. They were particularly angered at the U.S. commitment to gradually reduce its arms sales to Taiwan. Senator John East said it is a great tragedy that the joint communique has crippled U.S. support for Taiwan and created a political atmosphere to continue to isolate Taiwan. He also said: "We are leaving open all options; we might have to deal with it later through the courts or through Congress."

What these congressmen said amounts to nothing but sticking to the "Taiwan Relations Act", and attempting to handle the relations between the U.S. and China according to this U.S. internal law aimed at interfering in China's internal affairs. Knowing nothing about the elementary principles governing international relations, they are so impudent as to have come out to attack the communique.

TRA SAID TO VIOLATE SPIRIT OF COMMUNIQUE

HK201458 Beijing ZHONGGUO ZINWEN SHE in Chinese 1353 GMT 20 Aug 82

[Text] Beijing, 20 Aug (ZHONGGUO XINWEN SHE) -- After deliberating and negotiating for a period of time, China and the United States have published a joint communique. The United States has made three commitments with regard to the arms sales to Taiwan: The U.S. arms sale to Taiwan will not exceed, either in qualitative or in quantitative terms, the level of those supplied in recent years since the establishment of diplomatic relations between the United States and China; it intends gradually to reduce its sale of arms to Taiwan; and it will facilitate a final resolution of the problem over a period of time.

The U.S. commitments have dispelled all at once the dark clouds hanging over Sino-U.S. relations. They are well received by all people who are concerned with the development of the international situation. If the various principles embodied in the communique are implemented, Sino-U.S. relations are bound to develop.

However, as soon as the dark clouds were dispersed, the cold wind began to blow. It is noticed that the U.S. leaders and some U.S. media, when talking of those points concerning the U.S. arms sales to Taiwan in the communique, have stated that they are "completely consistent with the Taiwan Relations Act," that the U.S. arms sales to Taiwan "will be carried on in accordance with the Taiwan Relations Act," and so on.

This is a poor remark! It distorts the content of the joint communique and jeopardizes the development of Sino-U.S. relations. Obviously, the nine points contained in the communique have nothing to do with the U.S. "Taiwan Relations Act." In the joint communique of China and the United States, both parties have primarily reiterated the fundamental principle of "showing mutual respect for each other's sovereignty and territorial integrity and noninterference in each other's internal affairs." This principle was laid down in the Shanghai Communique and the communique on the establishment of diplomatic relations between China and the United States. It has been, is now and will be the fundamental principle guiding Sino-U.S. relations.

The United States has made three promises in the communique, claiming that it treasures its relations with China and reiterating three "no intentions": No intention of infringing on Chinese sovereignty and territorial integrity, no intention of interfering in China's internal affairs and no intention of pursuing the policy of "two Chinas" or "one China, one Taiwan." People will ask: Then why is the United States simultaneously bringing out the "Taiwan Relations Act," which has nothing to do with the communique? There were obstacles in the development of Sino-U.S. relations in the past because the United States pushed forward the "Taiwan Relations Act," which had been formulated by the United States alone. If the United States carries on pursuing this policy, it is not hard for us to imagine the future of Sino-U.S. relations.

China has always resolutely opposed the U.S. "Taiwan Relations Act." This is because it seriously violates the guiding principles of international law and brazenly interferes in China's internal affairs. Some people now insist that the Sino-U.S. joint communique is "completely consistent" with the "Taiwan Relations Act." This is, in fact, violating the spirit and essence of the Sino-U.S. communique and is absolutely unacceptable to the Chinese people.

The Sino-U.S. agreement on bringing about, over a period of time, a final settlement of the question of U.S. arms sales to Taiwan should be cherished.

If the United States really treasures Sino-U.S. relations, it should comply with the principles of the Sino-U.S. joint communique in actual practice. Any acts or deeds in violation of the spirit of the communique will hamper the maintenance and consolidation of Sino-U.S. relations.

U.S. TO EXTEND AIRCRAFT ACCORD WITH TAIWAN

[Text] Washington, 19 Aug (XINHUA) -- The U.S. Government notified Congress today that it has decided to extend its agreement with Taiwan to jointly produce F-15E aircraft. The agreement stipulates that the U.S. Northrop Company will sell to Taiwan the equipment needed for the joint production of 30 F-5E and 30 F-5F aircraft in Taiwan within a period of 2 years, involving a total amount of 240 million U.S. dollars. The agreement originally signed between the United States and Taiwan for the joint production of F-5E aircraft was to expire in mid-1983.

In a letter to Congress, the U.S. Department of Defense once again linked the U.S. arms sale to Taiwan to the "Taiwan Relations Act," which runs counter to the principles embodied in the joint communique on the establishment of diplomatic relations between China and the United States, claiming that this proposed new arms deal "accords with U.S. law and policy."

According to U.S. practice, if Congress does not veto a proposal for an arms sale to a foreign nation within 1 month after it receives the formal government notice, it means that Congress has approved the deal.

On the third day following the announcement of the joint communique issued by China and the United States on resolving the issue of U.S. arms sales to Taiwan, the U.S. Government already shows itself to be unable to restrain itself in forwarding its proposal to Congress for the sale of equipment to Taiwan needed for the production of 60 aircraft. It is hard for the Chinese people to understand this point. They are closely watching further developments on this issue.

JAPAN SEEN WELCOMING JOINT PRC-U.S. COMMUNIQUE

Foreign Ministry Statement

OW211422 Beijing XINHUA in English 1253 GMT 21 Aug 82

[Text] Tokyo, August 21 (XINHUA) -- The Japanese Foreign Ministry has issued a statement welcoming the agreement between China and the United States regarding U.S. arms sales to Taiwan as essential for peace and stability in Asia, according to a KYODO report. The statement, issued on August 17, said that Japan had been following the development of Sino-American negotiations because it believed that the maintenance and furtherance of friendly relations between China and the United States was essential for peace in Asia and the world.

The statement said: "The United States and China have overcome a difference in their positions to arrive at a satisfactory agreement." "The Japanese Government admires the leaders of the two countries for their wise decision and efforts" and "hopes that U.S.-Chinese relations will further develop satisfactorily and smoothly."

Press Reaction

[Text] Tokyo, August 21 (XINHUA) -- The publication of the China-United States joint communique has been welcomed by the Japanese press which hopes that the United States will completely stop its arms sales to Taiwan as early as possible. TOKYO SHIMBUN said in an editorial that proceeding from an overall point of view, the United States and China have made efforts to narrow their differences. Japan, who maintains friendly relations with both countries, feels exceptionally happy about this situation. The editorial expressed the hope that the time will soon come when the U.S. arms sales to Taiwan cease completely through the common efforts of the two countries. The editorial warned the United States not to continue endlessly its arms sales to Taiwan in order to avoid another confrontation with China.

MAINICHI SHIMBUN said editorially that the release of the China-United States joint communique has prevented a further deterioration of Sino-U.S. relations. This has contributed greatly to the maintenance of peace and stability of the international community. Hence, the efforts made by the two countries to this end should be given positive appraisal.

The editorial requested the United States to realize that Taiwan is a part of China's territory, and to respect the joint communique instead of pursuing a wrong Taiwan policy.

ASAHI SHIMBUN said in an editorial that a well-developed United States-China relationship is important not only to both countries but also to peace and stability in Asia. "We have been watching the progress of the negotiations (between the two countries), for we have been worried about a possible retrogression of that relationship. After strenuous and persistent negotiations, the United States and China have avoided another confrontation. This is a wise choice for both sides," the editorial said.

NIHON KEIZAI SHIMBUN said editorially that in the joint communique, the United States promises to limit its arms sales to Taiwan both quantitatively and qualitatively on its way to a total cease of such arms sales. The United States also accepts China's consistent stand on a complete stop of arms sales to Taiwan. Therefore, the editorial said, the danger of a further deterioration of Sino-U.S. relations will be basically checked.

Sakurauchi's Remarks

[Text] Beijing, Aug 20 (XINHUA) — Japanese Foreign Minister Yoshio Sakurauchi reiterated at a meeting of the House of Councillors Thursday that the spirit of the Japan-China joint statement should be correctly reflected in textbooks, JIJI PRESS reported. He said the issue of the textbook screening system is an internal affair of Japan, but it has violated the practice when diplomatic relations with China were established. To speak bluntly, "it is perplexing," he said, adding that the agreement reached then should be implemented.

He said correction naturally must be made if there are facts running counter to the "self-reflection" expressed by Japan in the normalization agreement. Yoshio Sakurauchi expressed the view that the wording of "advance" should be changed back into "aggression."

According to KYODO, Japanese Chief Cabinet Secretary Kiichi Miyazawa told the Education Committee meeting of the House of Councillors Thursday that the issue of textbooks is very important both to the Education Ministry and the Foreign Ministry. Therefore, views will be exchanged between the two ministries, and when unanimity is reached to some degree, the issue will be reported to Prime Minister Zenko Suzuki for final decision.

XINHUA Commentary

["A Mere Expression of 'Willingness' To Correct Mistakes Is Not Enough -- Commentary by XINHUA Correspondent" -- XINHUA headline]

[Text] Beijing, Aug 22 (XINHUA) -- A great storm has been raised in the Asian-Pacific region and throughout the world by the Japanese Education Ministry which whitewashed the history of Japanese aggression in screening textbooks. The storm has continued unabated for almost a whole month.

Extremely isolated are a handful of Japanese officials who cling to the position of distorting history. They have become the objects of accusation in China, Korea and Southeast Asian countries and condemnation throughout Japan. Their position has also caused deep differences within the Japanese ruling party.

Public opinion in North America and Western Europe has also joined in the campaign to criticize the Japanese Education Ministry's mistakes.

Things have come to such a pass that nobody would tolerate the few officials stubborn attitude of persisting in the mistakes. Neither would it be an act of wisdom to shilly-shally on the matter -- and the longer the shillyshally, the worse trouble they would be in for. Time is pressing. Any further hesitation would make their bungles pile up. That's why public opinion in Japan is calling for an "early decision" to be made by its government to rectify the mistakes in the textbooks.

Some senior Japanese officials have expressed their willingness to show full respect to the criticisms at home and abroad and to settle the problem as soon as possible. Such expressions are of course somewhat better than none and a lot better than a refusal to correct the mistakes. But their sincerity should be called to question if they always remain at the stage of making statements about their "willingness" to correct the mistakes. One would suspect that such statements are a trick to gain a respite or false pretences to get by, rather than a real step in the right direction.

The people of China and Japan are not content with a mere expression of "willingness". An immediate and resolute action to rectify the mistakes is all they want.

Their demand should be taken into consideration especially when one takes note of the fact that a few of the Japanese officials who have expressed "willingness" to correct the mistakes have refused to openly admit that the Japanese authorities concerned bear the responsibility to correct the distortions in the textbooks concerning the history of Japanese aggression in China. Is it not the time to make a resolute decision to correct the mistakes?

THAI ARMED FORCES ON KAMPUCHEAN BORDER ON ALERT

OW201330 Beijing XINHUA in English 1254 GMT 20 Aug 82

[Text] Bangkok, August 20 (XINHUA) -- Thai armed forces along the Thai-Kampuchean border have been ordered on the alert following the reported military build-up by Vietnamese troops near the border and the escalation of fighting between the Kampuchean resistance forces and the Vietnamese invaders. Thai military sources at the border disclosed that high-powered weapons and fresh reinforcements had been moved into the Kampuchean-Thai border areas to strengthen Vietnamese forces there. The Vietnamese had also reportedly been digging tunnels and mounting artillery guns near the border.

Fighting between the Vietnamese-Heng Samrin forces and the Democratic Kampuchean guerrillas has escalated considerably of late, particularly at Phnom Mak Heun.

Inhabitants in two Thai villages close to the Thai-Kampuchean border were evacuated yesterday as precautions against possible spillover of fighting between the Kampuchean resistance forces and Vietnamese troops.

WORK OF HUNGARIAN TRADE UNIONS EXPLAINED, LAUDED

[Article by Ji Ping [7871 1627]: "Trade Unions and Democratic Business Management -- Impressions of a Visit to Hungary (2)"]

[Text] During my stay in Hungary I visited several famous factories including the (La Bao) [2139 7637] car factory with a history of over 80 years, the Budapest woolen mill, which occupies an important position in Hungary's textile industry, a 30-year-old refrigeration plant and the Budapest printing works, which developed out of the underground printing works that existed before liberation. I was extremely impressed by the advanced equipment and scientific organization of these factories as well as the seriousness with which production and the welfare of the workers is handled. But what interested me most of all was the role of trade unions in democratic business management.

After outlining the works' automation and the democratic management within the plant, the chief engineer of the Budapest printing works told me that as far as they are concerned, computerization is not of prime importance. It is more important to establish good rapport between employees; to this end, it is necessary to develop a democratic enterprise and this makes the role of the trade unions indispensible. People feel the opinions of the trade unions are extremely important in dealing with the workers' livelihood, working conditions and problems of social development in Hungary. The power enjoyed by the trade unions is expressly provided for, and guaranteed, by law.

Since 1968 Hungary was carried out a full-scale restructuring of its economic system, and since then it has clearly stated that the main political aim of the restructuring of the economic system is to improve business democracy and implement direct worker involvement in the management of a business. In this regard, some of my Hungarian friends explained the system of labor union group leader committees. They regard the implementation of this system as one step closer to the full realization of business democracy and the effectiveness of the role of the trade unions as a substantive change.

According to one Hungarian trade union cadre, the trade union group leader committees are "the best all-round platforms for business democracy." The secretary of the Budapest woolen mill trade union explained that all trade union group leaders are democratically elected. Normally one group leader is elected by between 10 and 30 trade unionists. Before the elections, the opinions of the trade unionists are sought and candidates are selected on the basis of good record, popularity and prestige and the ability to relate and represent the masses. Voting is then carried out by secret ballot with elections taking place once every 5 years. The head of the workshop, a woman who the entire factory had elected as secretary of the union, explained to me the powers of the trade union group leader committees. She said that in addition to powers of approval, recommendation supervision and representation, the trade union group leader committees also had the power to veto certain illegal activities and measures which might be considered contradictory to the principles of socialist morality. The (La Bao) car factory has a total of 1,000 trade union group leaders, of which 150 are selected as group leader representatives and make up the trade union group leader committee. In general, committees meet four or five times a year and discuss production plans, the implementation of collective contracts as well as the presentation of opinions on future development plans. They also discuss employee living and working conditions, wages and other issues affecting the factory as a whole. The factory leaders must make work reports to the group leader committee, as well as listen to comments and criticisms and answer questions and queries from the committee. The group leaders are then responsible for informing all workers within their units of all committee decisions.

What changes in the democratic management of the factory did the implementation of the trade union group leader committee system bring about? The trade union secretary of the woolen mill explained that the introduction of the committee system has enabled the workers to directly participate in the business management by means of the trade union group leader, while the factory leaders are able to listen directly to the voices of the workers via the group leaders, thereby facilitating communication between the leaders and the masses and helping to overcome bureaucracy. One Hungarian friend of mine said that in this way it helps coordinate and consolidate benefits and hence unity, for the country, both collective and individual benefits. He illustrated this by pointing out that the last few years have seen considerable economic problems, the only option open being to fight to maintain the standard of living that Hungary had already reached. In response to this, the trade union group leader committee examined this problem in depth and then actively sought to explain to the workers the present economic problems and general situation and then mobilized the workers to try and increase production and struggle to overcome these difficultites. The trade union group leader committee setup has also led to improvements in relations between cadres and the workers. Thus, if a company leader makes all the decisions, the likelihood is that this will not work, since the workers have the right to directly supervise and criticize the company leaders' work. When I visited the refrigeration works, one of the trade union representatives told me that every year the group leader committee and production committee evaluate the work of the leaders in every level of the company and occasionally carry out personal criticisms. Every 3 years all cadres undergo a comprehensive evaluation, the results of which are passed on to the higher-level cadres, thus greatly aiding the improvement in the quality of work of the cadres in every level of the company.

During my interviews, some of my Hungarian friends said the elevated importance of the trade unions as well as the strengthening of the democratic management of businesses has resulted in higher expectations from the labor organizations and affiliated cadres. The trade union secretary of the woolen mill put her finger on it when she said that if the union itself is to be respected then each one of us must do his work well. The trade union should not merely sit back and enjoy its powers. It is more important that it should willingly perform its duties to benefit everyone. Hence, its role is not a formal one but more one of fully and responsibly taking part in voicing opinions and making decisions. Thus, the trade union groups must continually strengthen their own organization and improve their own work, while the trade union cadres continue to study and research ways in which they might improve their work capacity.

Naturally, the reality of the situation is not really as perfect as the description of the trade union's powers and role, as defined by my Hungarian friends. Bureaucracy still exists in everyday life. There are still people who do not work according to rule and others who act entirely on their own initiative. There are even some factory leaders who feel that their presence negates the need for any trade union! For these reasons, my Hungarian friends admitted that there is still a great deal of work to be done before the trade unions can achieve their aims of making management democracy in business a reality.

REAGAN APPROVES U.S. FORCES DEPLOYMENT TO BEIRUT

OW201854 Beijing XINHUA in English 1836 GMT 20 Aug 82

[Text] Washington, August 20 (XINHUA) -- President Ronald Reagan today approved the deployment of U.S. forces to Beirut as part of a multinational force to "insure the departure" of PLO forces.

The statement came after a U.S.-sponsored plan to resolve the west Beirut crisis had been agreed upon by all the parties involved.

In the statement he made at the White House Rose Garden, Reagan said: "Our purpose will be to assist the Lebanese armed forces in carrying out their responsibility for insuring the departure of PLO leaders, officers, and combatants in Beirut, from Lebanese territory under safe and orderly conditions."

"The presence of United States forces also will facilitate the restoration of the sovereignty and authority of the Lebanese Government over the Beirut area," he said. "In no case will our troops stay longer than 30 days." He also said that France and Italy will also join in the efforts.

Reagan indicated that a successful resolution of the west Beirut crisis will "set the stage for the urgent international action required to restore Lebanon's full sovereignty, unity, and territorial integrity; obtain the rapid withdrawal of all foreign forces from that country; and help insure the security of northern Israel."

He pledged "to move quickly in the context of Camp David to resolve the Palestinian issue in all its aspects, as well as the other unresolved problems in the Arab-Israeli conflict." "Only when all these steps are accomplished can true and lasting peace and security be achieved in the Middle East," he said.

PALESTINIAN FIGHTERS TO START BEIRUT EVACUATION

[Text] Beirut, August 19 (XINHUA) -- Lebanese Foreign Minister Fu'ad Butrus announced today that the first group of Palestinian fighters will evacuate Beirut at noon Saturday. The evacuation will start a few hours after a 350-man French advance contingent arrives in Port Beirut to protect the safety of the departing Palestinians.

Butrus told Lebanon television that all preparations had been finished for the implementation of the agreement. An Israeli pilot and an Israeli soldier would be released Friday, he said.

He pointed out that the Lebanese army will play a "principal role" in the implementation of the agreement and the multi-national peace-keeping force will operate only to assist the Lebanese army.

Butrus said that the PLO's evacuation from Beirut will be merely the first step toward a solution to the Lebanon problem and that the next step will focus on the withdrawal of Israeli as well as other foreign forces from Lebanon.

Israeli Foreign Minister Yitzhaq Shamir said on television today that Israeli troops will not withdraw from Lebanon before Syria withdraws its own troops.

Meanwhile, Israeli troops in the Bekaa Valley have been on alert against what Israel called a "violation of ceasefire" by Syrian and PLO forces, radio Israel reported. Israeli Defense Minister Ari'el Sharon has warned Syria from making an attack on Israeli troops, the radio said.

FIRST FRENCH CONTINGENT ARRIVES IN BEIRUT

OW211430 Beijing XINHUA in English 1300 GMT 21 Aug 82

[Text] Beirut, August 21 (XINHUA) -- A 350-man French contingent arrived in Beirut port this morning to protect the withdrawal of the Palestinian fighters from Beirut, according to radio Beirut. The contingent, assigned to a 2,100 multi-national force, will be joined later by 800 American and 500 Italian as well as 450 more French troops.

The first group of Palestinian fighters will go aboard a Hellenic merchant ship this afternoon, heading toward Cyprus en route to Iraq and Jordan.

The Lebanese Information Ministry said in a communique last night that no journalists would be allowed to get access to the port for covering the evacuation.

Lebanese Prime Minister Shafiq al-Wazzan confirmed yesterday that two Israel servicemen and the remains of nine Israeli servicemen were already handed over to Israel by the Palestine Liberation Organization, eliminating the last obstacle to the evacuation.

Al-Wazzan said he had got a guarantee from the U.S. Government two days ago that the evacuation plan worked out by U.S. presidential envoy Philip Habib would go ahead as scheduled and the United States would make efforts toward the release of Lebanese and Palestinians taken prisoner by Israel.

[Text] Beijing, August 21 (XINHUA) -- The first contingent of Palestinian guerrillas are leaving the war-ridden Beirut where they have fought Israeli aggressors for two and a half months, according to reports reaching here today. The 400 uniformed guerrillas carrying light weapons began boarding a Greek ship for Cyprus this afternoon amid tears, kisses and a storm of gun salutes. The on-leaving guerrillas were seen off by thousands of their comrades at a sports stadium in west Beirut.

The PLO's military chief of staff, Abu Jihad, showed up at the last minute at the stadium kissing and shaking hands with the departing fighters. "Our revolution continues," he told them. "We are with each other. We will go on together." Flying Lebanese and Palestinian flags, the guerrillas chanted "revolution until victory" and vowed to see again [as received] in Palestinian territory.

The evacuation was supervised by French troops who had newly arrived and Lebanese soldiers who replaced Israeli troops before the arrival of French Legionnaries. It is scheduled to be followed by the withdrawal of about 7,000 Palestinian fighters in two weeks.

SHULTZ HOLDS PRESS CONFERENCE ON MIDEAST

OW211354 Beijing XINHUA in English 1223 GMT 21 Aug 82

[Text] Washington August 20 (XINHUA) -- U.S. Secretary of State George Shultz said here today that the planned withdrawal of the PLO forces from Lebanon "makes it more urgent" for the Palestinian issue to be addressed, and perhaps there are more opportunities for achieving a Middle East settlement. Today's press conference, his first since taking office, was held at a time when an agreement had been reached on the PLO's withdrawal and the U.S. Government had agreed to send troops for the multinational forces on supervising the withdrawal.

Asked what the U.S. was considering to do to enhance the peace prospect in the Middle East, Shultz said: "We must all concentrate on creating a just peace." He refused to elaborate.

Shultz mentioned several times the "legitimate rights" for the Palestinian people, but when asked what it meant, he said: "The Palestinians should have a role in determining the conditions under which they will be governed."

The secretary conceded that U.S. relations with its friends in the Arab world "have been strained" as a result of Israel's invasion of Lebanon. The U.S. would seek to resolve these strained relations by reaffirming the United States "fundamental commitment" to peaceful solutions of the standing issues in this area, he added.

On U.S.-Israeli relations, he said Washington felt some of Israel's military actions were "excessive". However, he said the U.S. relationship with Israel "remains a strong one." "We are completely committed to the support of the security of Israel," Shultz said.

RENMIN RIBAO COMMENTATOR ON GOVERNMENT REFORM

[Commentator's article: "After the First Step Has Been Taken"]

[Text] The central party and government organs have obtained remarkable achievements in carrying out organizational reform in the initial stage, and the progress of the reform has been smooth. However, this only means that the first step has been taken and we have not completed the task of organizational reform. There is still an enormous amount of work awaiting our attention. Apart from doing a good job of making arrangements for old cadres, all units must still treat improving the system of work, the method of work and work style as an important element of organization reform and do a good job of them.

The objective of organizational reform is to overcome bureaucratism and promote work efficiency. Now that organizations have been streamlined and more capable and energetic persons have been promoted to the leadership posts, this has created advantageous conditions for overcoming bureaucratism and improving work efficiency. However, we should not presume that bureaucratism will automatically vanish as soon as the organizations have been streamlined. We should realize that bureaucratism can occur among a big or small group of people. Thus after the organizations have been combined and streamlined, all units must, in accordance with the new situation, formulate and perfect the system of work, clarify the function and scope of power, improve the method of work and change the work style. Only by so doing can we really overcome bureaucratism and improve work efficiency.

Some units are already grasping this now. For instance, in its first party panel meeting after carrying out organizational reform, the Ministry of Water Conservancy and Power clearly pointed out that all leaders must take the lead in improving work efficiency. It also pointed out that each leader must personally grasp the implementation of the principles and policies, grasp investigations, work independently and take up responsibilities, and that meetings and documents should be concise, and questions must be handled promptly within a fixed time limit. Take the Ministry of Coal Industry for another example. After basically fulfilling the task of organizational reform in the beginning of March this year, it carried out discussions, clarified the functions and scope of power of the subordinate departments, bureaus and offices, and formulated the personal responsibility system for personnel ranking from the minister to the ordinary personnel. They have changed the past practice of mixing responsibilities, working without coordination and "shifting responsibilities like playing football." They are now grasping the main point and have made a good beginning. We not only demand new organizations and new leadership groups, but also a new work style and new appearances which will greatly improve the efficiency of the leading organs. It is necessary for us to arouse the attention of certain units which, up to now, have still failed to do a good job of improving the system of work, method of work and the work style. The task of carrying out organizational reform is like sailing a boat against the current; it will be driven back if it does not forge ahead.

If we slacken our efforts, not only will we fail to make greater achievements but we will fail to consolidate the achievements obtained, or even worse, will take the road back. Therefore, we must carry on making improvements and cannot give up halfway.

This organizational reform is being carried out under circumstances whereby neither the political nor the economic system have been comprehensively reformed. Thus, this organizational reform will not be very thorough and is bound to give rise to certain new contradictions. Organizations which have been reformed will have contradictions with the traditional customs and work style which people have gotten used to and which do not fit in with the new situation. In addition, there will also be contradictions with the current political and economic systems which have not yet been comprehensively reformed. We are now confronted with such a question: whether the organizations which have been reformed are pushing the political and economic system forward, or will they take the road back because they encounter difficulties under the circumstances whereby comprehensive reform has not been carried out. As far as this question is concerned, there are two possible aspects. Thus, we must practically do a good job of work after the first step has been taken and accordingly improve the system and method of work and work style. For instance, now that the number of leading cadres has been reduced in the State Council and various ministries and commissions, and now that organizations have been streamlined, it is necessary to consider giving the lower levels more power and avoid the phenomenon of overconcentration in order to give play to the enthusiasm, initiative and functions of the various departments at various levels. It is necessary to clarify the guiding ideology that we can only advance and not retrogress in the future despite contradictions and difficulties. A summation of the above is: Organizational reform has not been thoroughly carried out because it has been carried out under circumstances whereby the political and economic systems have not been comprehensively reformed; but we should make use of this reform to push forward many aspects of the reform of the political and economic systems, creating the conditions for an overall reform in the future.

CHINA DAILY ON CHANGES IN RURAL POLITICAL POWER

["Opinion" column: "Constitutional Change Will Boost People's Power"]

[Text] According to the principle laid down in the draft of the revised constitution, township governments should be set up and people's communes should remain only as units of the collective economy and should no longer perform the functions of political power.

This is highly necessary for developing the rural economy and strengthening rural political power.

First: This will help maintain the powers of decision of the units of the collective economy. Experience, both negative and positive, has shown that only when the powers of decision of these collective economic units are guaranteed under the guidance of unified state planning can their enthusiasm and that of individual labourers be aroused and a motive force be generated for improving management and raising economic effectiveness.

Integration of government administration with commune management has been a major cause of the harm done to the powers of decision of these units. A people's commune, as an economic unit, should enjoy the full right of independent management. Yet, since it is at the same time also a level of government, it must receive instructions and interventions from superior government organs. Likewise, a production team, as the basic accounting unit, should also enjoy substantial powers of decision in management. Yet, since the commune and production birgade above it also wield the power of government intervention, its powers of decision can hardly be guaranteed.

Separation of government administration from commune management is therefore an important structural measure for making these economic units independent of the organs or political power and for securing their powers of decision.

Second: The separation of government administration from commune management will also provide conditions for the development of agriculture in the direction of specialization and socialization.

Rural Change

China's countryside is now undergoing a change from monoculture to a diversified economy, from a natural or seminatural economy to socialization, specialization and commercialization. In the long run, rural economic organizations and their activities are bound to exceed the limits of jurisdiction by grass-roots authorities.

In fact, in recent years, more and more communes and production brigades along the Yangtze and Peal River Deltas and on the out-skirts of Beijing, Tianjin and Shanghai and in other places where agriculture is fairly developed have overstepped the bounds of administrative areas in conducting their economic activities.

New economic integrations transcending administrative areas have also emerged. This shows that, in a certain sense, the structure integrating government administration with commune management has already been broken. This is in conformity with the requirements of the development of the productive forces.

However, in the past, integration of government administration with commune management had confirned the economic units and their activities within the limits of the authority of the administrative areas and hampered the development of the collective economy along the direction of commodity flows.

Third: Separation of government administration from commune management is favourable for the strengthening of management and the training of personnel.

Cadre Responsibility

Practice shows that when government administration is integrated with commune management, it is very hard to establish a system of responsibility for cadres. This is because, on the one hand, a cadre's personal interest is not directly associated with the collective economy, inevitably affecting his enthusiasm, and on the other hand, since a cadre usually assumes more than one post at the same time, he can hardly devote his energy to both management and other vocational work.

As a result, the management system in many communes is still imperfect and only a limited number of managerial personnel have been trained.

All this shows that government administration must be separated from commune management; othterwise, the development of the rural economy will be hindered.

Politically, separation of government administration from commune management is also needed for developing socialist democracy.

Ours is a state of the people's democratic dictatorship led by the working class and based on the alliance of workers and peasants. Authorities of grass-roots units are organs of state power at the primary level. Those in power at the grass-roots level should be elected and supervised by the masses of the people who also have the right to recall any of them, so that state power at the primary level will be truly in the hands of the people.

However, when political power is integrated with commune management, it is likely that power will be concentrated in the hands of only a small number of people and, because of a lack of effective supervision, it is very difficult to prevent some people abusing their power and encroaching upon the democratic rights of the masses.

Therefore, separation of political power from commune management will be an important measure for safeguarding the rights of the masses. This will also help the masses to carry out democratic management of the economy according to policies and law.

Moreover, development of the rural economy has posed new problems for the building of political power and for administrative work. For instance, while the production responsibility system, now being widely practised in China's countryside, has infused the masses with new zeal and pushed production forward, at the same time, civil disputes over the use of water and electricity, which must be shared, have also increased. In some places, where cadres have concerned themselves only with specific economic matters, political power has weakened and thefts, gambling and feudal superstitious activities have reappeared and are disrupting normal production and life.

To solve these problems, political power must be strengthened. The separation of government administration from commune management and the setting up of township governments and villagers' committees will help consolidate unity and stability in the countryside, develop welfare and cultural undertakings and strengthen the building of villages and towns.

The separation of government administration from commune management is a major issue in the political and economic life of the 800 million Chinese peasants and must be conducted step by step, in a planned way and with great care. Generally speaking, several years will be required to accomplish such a reform.

AGRICULTURAL DIVERSIFICATION, READJUSTMENT VIEWED

OW211441 Beijing XINHUA in English 1200 GMT 21 Aug 82

[Text] Beijing, August 21 (XINHUA) -- China's agricultural readjustment reduced the area for food crops by 5.6 million hectares in the last three years but their output still rose 6.6 percent during the period.

More wheat and rapeseed were harvested this summer, according to the Ministry of Agriculture, Animal Husbandry and Fishery.

The grain acreage was reduced to make room for industrial crops, which are now sown on an area 3.06 million hectares larger than in 1975. Grain fields on steep slopes unsuitable for crop cultivation have been switched over to tree and grass growing.

China began readjusting the proportion between grain production and industrial crops and also between farming and forestry, animal husbandry, fishery and other rural sidelines following the Third Plenary Session of the 11th Chinese Communist Party Central Committee in December, 1978.

Thanks to the implementation of the policy of encouraging the diversification of the rural economy, China's 1981 output of oil-bearing seeds was 4.95 million tons more than that of 1978, an increase of 95.6 percent. The increase for cotton was 800,000 tons, up 36.9 percent; sugarcane and sugarbeet, up 51.3 percent; tea, up 27.8 percent; and silkworm cocoons, up 45.1 percent. These are the fastest rates of increase since 1952.

Results of soil surveys being carried out across the country have been used in the work of agricultural zoning and readjusting the distribution of crops where this is called for.

From 1979 to 1981, scattered hillside plots totalling 200,000 hectares in the southern provinces of Sichuan, Jiangxi and Hunan that used to give poor yields of cotton were replanted to crops better suited to the local conditions. In Henan and Shandong Provinces to the north, cotton was planted to a total of 933,000 hectares which give only low yields when sown to grain.

Seven provinces along the Yangtze River expanded the area under rapeseed by 1,266,000 hectares. The area under sugarbeet was expanded by 104,000 hectares in Heilongjiang Province, the Inner Mongolia Autonomous Region and the Xinjiang Uygur Aytonomous Region, China's major producers of the crop. The area under sugarcane was expanded in tropical and sub-tropical Guangdong Province and the Guangxi Zhuang Autonomous Region in south China.

In 1981, the area under food crops in China accounted for 79.2 percent of the total sown area, compared to 80.3 percent in 1978. During the same 1978-81 period, the corresponding percentage for industrial crops increased from 9.6 percent to 12.1 percent.

No further significant change is to be made in the acreage for grain and industrial crops in the foreseeable future. From now on, said officials of the ministry, China will concentrate on improving per-unit output of both food and industrial crops to incrase total output.

During the "Cultural Revolution" years (1966-76), cotton production was virtually at a standstill. The production of oil-bearing seeds increased at an average annual rate of only 0.9 percent in the decade.

The Chinese Government has raised the purchasing prices of major farm products since 1979. Meanwhile, it has reduced purchase quotas for grain so that peasants are in a better position to diversify their economy. In addition, the government rewards those peasants who sell cotton, sugarcane and sugarbeet in excess of the purchase quotas either by paying for the excess amount with higher prices or by increasing grain supplies to these peasants.

Under the current policy, peasants have the initiative in planning the distribution of the crops in the light of local conditions.

Speaking of the future development of China's agriculture, officials of the Ministry of Agriculture, Animal Husbandry and Fishery said that China, with a population of 1 billion, will have to continue increasing grain output. Nevertheless, still greater attention will be paid to animal husbandry, forestry, fishery and rural sidelines. In 1981, the output value of animal husbandry and sidelines respectively accounted for only 15.4 percent and 14.3 percent of China's total agricultural output value, and the corresponding figures for forestry and fishery were 4.1 percent and 1.8 percent.

AGRICULTURE BENEFICIARY OF RESPONSIBILITY SYSTEM

OW201346 Beijing XINHUA in English 1258 GMT 20 Aug 82

[Text] Beijing, August 20 (XINHUA) -- Agriculture has been the most dynamic sector of China's national economy in the three years since the adoption of the responsibility system in 1979.

Despite natural disasters in this or that part of the country each year, harvests have been good and peasants are earning and spending more.

Agricultural output value rose at an average annual rate of 5.6 percent between 1979 and 1981, as against 3.2 percent in the preceding 26 years.

Grain output went up 6.6 percent, and there were faster rates of increases for cotton, oil-bearing crops, sugar beet and sugar cane, tobacco, tea, fruit, draft animals and sheep and goats. This year's summer harvest was bigger than last year's and the autumn crops are doing well.

Shandong and Anhui Provinces, with a rural population of more than 100 million, both reported rural per capita income (from the collectives and family sidelines) of around 190 yuan for 1981. Compared with 1979, the income figure for 1981 in the two provinces rose by 50 percent. This is faster than in any other two-year period since 1949.

In many poor, grain-deficient areas of the country, such as northern and western Shandong Province and Guizhou Province, the responsibility system has led to marked improvement in the peasants' living standards. In mountainous Guizhou Province, one of the poorest areas in China, more than 15 percent of the peasant families had an average per capita income of over 300 yuan in 1981 against less than one percent in 1978, while families with an average per capita income of less than 100 yuan dropped from 72.9 percent in 1978 to 19.7 percent in 1981.

New houses are going up in most villages on the plains and in the hilly regions. This is the biggest housing construction boom since China's liberation.

In Shandong Province, one out of every four of the 12 million peasant families built new housing in 1980 and 1981. Brick and tile bungalows and two-storied houses of reinforced concrete and bricks are replacing old adobe homes. "The brick and tile kilns cannot keep up with house building demand," said Li Min, an official in charge of rural sideline occupations in Shandong Province.

A survey of 10,000 peasant families in Anhui Province shows the peasants are buying more durable consumer goods, better clothing and better food. According to commercial departments, the first year after the peasants switched over to the responsibility system, they usually bought clothing, daily necessities and farm implements. Now they are buying more costly items, including durable consumer goods and draft animals.

In almost all villages, in rich or what were poor areas, the girls are wearing new, bright colored clothes, often more attractive than their city cousins.

According to the People's Bank of China and the rural credit cooperatives, savings accounts in the rural areas at the end of June this year reached a record 24,490 million yuan, up 3,280 million yuan compared with the end of 1981.

The benefits brought about by agricultural progress are not confined to the countryside. The expansion of farming, stockraising and rural sidelines have put more and a greater variety of food on the urban and rural market and provided more raw materials for the textile, food-processing and other light industries.

The healthy growth of agriculture has helped rehabilitate China's national economy fairly quickly from the setbacks it suffered in the chaotic years of the Cultural Revolution.

Policies adopted since 1979 also include the rise in the state purchase prices for major farm products, the restoration of private farm plots and rural markets in areas where they were banned, and the encouragement given to the peasants to diversify the rural economy. But the responsibility system is by far the most important policy.

Wang Changtai, deputy head of Fengyang County, Anhui Province, said: "The responsibility system is socialist in nature since the land is collectively owned and every peasant is paid according to his labor." The other criteria, he said, are whether the peasants welcome the system and whether it mobilizes their initiative, whether it is possible to achieve maximum economic results with less input of labor and whether social material wealth is increased rapidly. "Facts show the responsibility system is successful," he said.

DU RUNSHENG ON RURAL RESPONSIBILITY SYSTEM

[Text] Beijing, August 20, (XINHUA) -- China keeps pressing forward to raise more food and other agricultural products and improve the living standards of the greatest number, the peasants, along a socialist path, said Du Runsheng, head of the newly established Rural Development Research Center, to XINHUA today.

The critical condition maintaining the socialist character of China's agriculture, he said, was collective ownership of the land which may not be sold, purchased, rented, transferred or laid waste. This means that no one is able to use land to seize the fruits of the labors of others. The tiller of the soil cannot be deprived of his land.

Now over half of the production teams in China have adopted the household responsibility system while other areas adopted the collective responsibility system. Under all forms of the responsibility system, every peasant is paid according to his labor.

Under the household responsibility system, the amount of farmland each family manages is based on how many members or labor power it has, or both. Since the income of the peasants is based on their harvests, and the decisive factor for the harvests is the input of labor, income distribution conforms to the socialist principle of "to each according to his work."

China's agriculture, he recalled, started on the road of collectivization in 1952, and the state and the peasants had made considerable investment, in funds and labor power, in building the collective economy. This has made it possible to provide food and clothing to meet the basic needs of its 1,000 million people, and the significance of the achievements should be acknowledged.

However, Du Runsheng pointed out, in rural China, production and management levels vary greatly from one area to another as do the farming conditions, and there had been over-emphasis on uniform management. Facts prove that large-scale management does not suit the production and management levels in all parts of the countryside. The job responsibility system, which assumes a great variety of forms with varying scales of operations, has overcome uniformity in collective management and it brings into fuller play the advantage of collective management and the initiative of the peasants.

China is now introducing a system of socialist economic management to arouse greater enthusiasm among the peasants, Du Runsheng said.

The peasants are free to arrange their farm work under the household responsibility system, but their economic operations are under the guidance of state plans, Du Runsheng said. The contracts signed between a peasant family and the production team fix the relations between the state, the collective and the individual. Such contracts are important in guaranteeing the socialist collective nature of the responsibility system, he said.

Under the contracts, peasant families have to fulfil their obligations to the state and their collectives. They pay, directly or through their collective, agricultural tax in kind, and meet state quotas for the purchase of farm products. The teams deduct from the families income a certain amount for expanding collective production and social welfare for common benefit.

Under all forms of the responsibility system, Du Runsheng said, large farm implements, reservoirs, irrigation facilities and large forests and enterprises remain collectively owned and managed.

In many areas, seed breeding and hybridization, the application of chemical fertilizer and insecticide and the supply of electricity within the communes are also under collective management.

A new development in recent years, Du Runsheng said, is the emergence of "specialized" labor groups, peasant families or peasants who signed contracts with their production team to undertake a certain type of work other than grain growing. These "specialized" groups or peasants work at industrial crops, forestry, livestock and poultry raising, fishery or other sidelines. In general they achieve a higher labor productivity and offer a much higher rate of marketable products than ordinary peasants.

Du Runsheng pointed out that such specialized management is different from the traditional small peasant economy which embraces different types of work but operates mainly for self-consumption. The new development represents a step toward socialized and specialized production and in some areas, the "specialized" families have joined forces in production, Du Runsheng said.

RESPONSIBILITY SYSTEM BOOSTS FORMER POOR AREAS

[Text] Beijing, August 21 (XINHUA) -- This summer's wheat harvest in formerly grain-deficient Fengyang County in east China, estimated at 150,000 tons, is enough to feed the half a million rural population there for a whole year. This is the best of their four successive good summer harvests since this county in Anhui Province adopted the household responsibility system in 1979. It is one of the earliest counties that adopted the system.

The peasants in the county were forced by poverty before liberation to wander to other places singing ballads as beggars. The wheat harvest gathered there this summer exceeds the figure for all grain for the whole of 1978. With big stacks of newly harvested wheat piled up high near their houses, many peasant families still have surplus grain in their homes sufficient to last them several months.

Fengyang is one of the many formerly poor areas in China that have become grain surplus only one or two years after adopting the responsibility system.

In a number of areas chronically hit by drought or waterlogging and known for their poverty in the Yellow and Huai He river basins, the millions of peasants used to subsist on sweet potatoes in the winter and spring months every year. These areas include Shangqui Prefecture in eastern Henan Province, Heze Prefecture in southwestern Shandong Province and northern Anhui. Although sweet potatoes are not relished by the people as a staple food, it gives better yields on poor farmland. In some of the counties, sweet potatoes made up 40 percent of the food crops reaped.

Today wheat and maize have become the staple food of the peasants there. With the adoption of the responsibility system, the peasants now work with great zeal and use more chemical fertilizer and better farming methods, according to agricultural departments. In many counties, sweet potatoes are now being used as a pig feed.

Peasants said that with more grain and more time to manage, they are able to raise more livestock and poultry as a domestic sideline and this also increases their income.

A new optimism animates the peasants. Yang Jinli of the Damiao People's Commune in Fengyang County said: "I plan to sell my surplus grain and tobacco to build a new house and to buy chemical fertilizer. Some other peasants intend to buy bicycles or set aside a nest egg for their children's marriage. Still others want to buy draft animals and farm implements.

The Chinese peasants purchased eight percent more chemical fertilizer and more small farm tools in the first half of this year than in the same period of last year. In many areas, small farm tools and implements are in short of supply.

In Fengyang County, Wang Changtai, deputy head of the county, said that the income of almost all the peasants has risen. Those families with more able-bodied peasants, farming experts and skilled hands in livestock and poultry raising have become better off more quickly. "This is natural now that the socialist principle to each according to his work is implemented," he said. "But no one profits from the labor of others," he added.

Deputy county head Wang Changtai pointed out that with the improvement of the rural economy, the collectives now have more public funds for expanding collective production and public welfare. The collectives now receive more money to provide social insurance for the old, the disabled and orphans who have no close relatives to depend upon.

There are still some families with difficulties, including families with many children but limited manpower, or families with unexpected illness or other disasters. Wang Changtai said they now account for only a few percent of the population, a much smaller percentage than before. The government is providing special aid to the most hard-hit families.

Yan Hongchang, deputy head of the Xiaogang production team, the first team that adopted the responsibility system in Fengyang, said in looking back: "We can now sell surplus grain every year as our contribution to building socialism instead of relying on the state for relief as we did for years."

He said: "Socialism has given us a good life and I am determined to take the socialist road. What we peasants wanted to end was a management system that rewarded everyone more or less the same no matter how good or poor their work."

Peasants Approve

OW210912 Beijing XINHUA in English 0710 GMT 21 Aug 82

[Text] Beijing, August 21 (XINHUA) -- "I like the household responsibility system because I now earn more for doing more. It has given me a greater say in farm management and I can arrange my time as I like," said 49-year-old Yang Shouzhen of the Damiao Peoples' Commune in Fengyang County of Anhui Province.

"Previous to this," she said, "we used to do all farm work in large groups. Amidst the bustle, the production team leader and the bookkeeper could not judge who did more and who just drifted along," she added.

The income of the peasants was then based on the number of work points they earned, and the work points were computed according to the type of work done and the days of attendence without linkage to the quantity and quality of work. This limited peasant incentive.

So far, 95 percent of the production teams in China have adopted various forms of the responsibility system to replace the work point system. Over half of the rural areas in China, including Fengyang County, have chosen the household responsibility system. Under the system, the production team sign a contract with each peasant family and the contract allows the peasant family to arrange farm work as it sees best, provided it fulfills the contract.

Other areas have the collective responsibility system under which the production team, in general 20 to 30 families, decides on farm tasks and deploys the labor power. In some cases still smaller labor groups of several to a score of peasants farm under contracts with the team.

The family of Yang Shouzhen and her husband Tang Mingxian is an example of how the household responsibility system operates. Their family of eight signed a contract with the production team to farm 2.6 hectares of land. Under the contract, it has to fulfill these obligations to the state: to deliver 422 kilograms of grain as agricultural tax in kind and sell 133 kilograms grain a year. These two items account for only a little over three percent of the family's annual grain output. The family also has to sell specified amounts of oil-bearing seeds, tobacco, pork and eggs to the state a year.

In addition, the family hands in 135.1 yuan for the collective a year, to be used for expanding collective production, social welfare and other purposes. This accounts for three percent of the family's annual income. The remainder of the products belong to the family for its own use, storage or sale at its own discretion.

The peasants in Anhui Province praise the responsibility system as "convenient, simple and straightforward, without complicated methods." It enables the peasants to see directly the results of their labor.

Zhao Yurong of Liyuan Commune in the same county said she and her husband Wu Fengqi now work harder since they are directly responsible for the success or failure of their harvest, and they now earn more. The 37-year-old robust woman said: "My husband is able to take care of all the three hectares and more of contracted farmland most of the time. I join with him in farm work only in the busy seasons." Since she now has more time, she feeds several pigs and goats and 30 chickens which bring the family a fair income.

Many women peasants said that formerly they had to work long hours in the fields like the men and had to do household chores and look after the children back home, and either this or that part of the work suffered. Now they can take better care of their families, they said.

Another form of the household responsibility system is known as "fixing output quotas for every household". It works according to the same principle of household management but has a different method for income distribution. The production team fixes output quotas for each family. The family, after delivering to the team the fixed output quotas for unified income distribution by the team, keeps the rest of the harvest for itself.

The responsibility system has changed the organization of labor and the methods of management and income distribution in China's countryside.

Tang Chuanpu, deputy director of the Fengyang County agricultural commission, pointed out that under the household responsibility system, the family still farms under the guidance of the collective in line with state plans. "Formerly government cadres or team leaders gave the peasants daily concrete work assignments. Now the collective sets the broad outlines for the year's production for the peasant families once a year in line with state plans. It gives them guidance not through administrative directives but through economic measures, that is, through contracts," he said.

DIVERSITY OF RURAL RESPONSIBILITY SYSTEMS VIEWED

[Text] Beijing, August 22 (XINHUA) -- The rural collective enterprises in Shaoxing Municipality in east China are so successful that their total output value averages several million yuan a year for each of the 69 people's communes in this area, according to Shi Zhen, deputy director of the Shaoxing municipal agricultural commission.

In some of the industrially developed communes, over half of the annual income of the peasants comes from these enterprises which are operated by the communes and production brigades. "Naturally the commune peasants want to have collective management and collective distribution of income," Shi Zhen said.

Today different forms of the job responsibility system coexist in every province and every county in China. While the household responsibility system is predominant in most areas, many parts of the fertile Yangtze River Delta and sparsely-populated northeast China employing large numbers of farm machinery practise the collective responsibility system.

Shaoxing Municipality, on the fringe of the Yangtze River Delta with a rural population of 890,000 provides an example of the collective responsibility system. The 69 people's communes there, each with an average membership of 13,000, have 1,127 production brigades which are again divided into 5,900 production teams.

The communes and brigades have 2,400 collectively-owned enterprises including textile mills, food-processing shops, breweries and other light industrial workshops. The enterprises have been developed on the basis of the traditional handicrafts and small-scale industries including hosiery weaving, shoe making, silk weaving, and the brewing of the famous Shaoxing wine.

In this fertile area in east China, three crops are grown a year and grain yield reaches around 10 tons a hectare. "This level of output," said Shi Zhen, "requires strict seed breeding and selection. This is done by the collectives which also unify the crops rotation sequence for each plot of land."

Moreover, the rural economy is highly diversified, branching out into crop growing, tea cultivation, fish breeding, sericulture and pearl oyster culture. "Therefore the system of collective responsibility with a division of labor among the labor groups suits our area," Shi Zhen said.

The collective responsibility system in Shaoxing Municipality operates like this: The peasants are organized into labor groups each with several to a score of people. The labor groups sign contracts with their brigades to grow grain and vegetables, raise pigs, grow tea or do other types of work. The labor groups have the freedom to arrange farm work and are rewarded by the brigade for overfulfilling the contracted quotas and bear responsibility for losses incurred due to mismanagement.

Another form of the collective responsibility is also being used -- the seasonal work norm. Under this system, peasant income is computed according to norms fixed by the production team for different seasons, no contracts are signed and all farm management is decided by the team.

Except for the work norm system, all the other forms of responsibility system require the signing of contracts. The production team may contract with labor groups, families or peasants. The contracts are the crux of such system since they link the income of the peasants with their harvests and relate their personal interests with those of the collective and the state.

The various forms of responsibility system intermingle in China's countryside so that there is virtually no area in China that adopts a single form of responsibility system.

For instance, in Tonglu, Fuyang and other counties of Zhejiang Province, where 60 to 70 percent of the production teams use household responsibility system, the peasant families contract with the teams only for the management of grain fields. The big tea and mulberry gardens, timber forests and industrial workshops are collectively owned.

In the rural area around Shaoxing City not far from these countries, where the collective responsibility system is predominant, there are "specialized families" within the collective economy. These "specialized families", which contract with the brigades to grow jasmine and breed fish and ducks, set their own rhythm of work.

In this way, every area in China is trying to find the forms of economic management and scales of operation best suited to itself.

The Central Committee of the Chinese Communist Party has stressed the principle that in choosing the responsibility system, each area should adopt the forms suited to its production and management levels and respect the choice of the masses.

GREAT PROGRESS REPORTED IN PLA MODERNIZATION

[Text] Beijing, 22 Aug (XINHUA) -- Since the 3d plenary session of the 11th party Central Committee, especially since Comrade Deng Xiaoping took charge of the work of the Military Commission, the PLA has made important new progress in building a modern, regular revolutionary army.

Information provided by the various PLA general departments shows that through conscientiously studying and implementing the party's line, principles and policies formulated since the 3d plenary session of the 11th party Central Committee and studying the basic theories of Marxism-Leninism-Mao Zedong Thought, all PLA units have in the past few years markedly enhanced their political consciousness and understanding of policies and further strengthened their sense of organization and discipline. The party Central Committee called for promoting socialist cultural development. The whole army has enthusiactically responded and, with fostering communist ideology as the focal point and the "four have's, three stresses and two fear-nots" as the main theme, vigorously trained a generation of new socialist people who have ideals, morality and culture and observe discipline. In the short period of more than a year, the army's mental outlook has taken on profound changes, and thousands of advanced collectives and individuals have emerged in promoting socialist cultural development. Quite a number of advanced models have won honorary titles conferred by the Military Commission of the CPC Central Committee, the various services and arms and the various military regions. Among them are the "heroic Faka Mountain battalion" and the Koulin Mountain combat heroes battalion" which distinguished themselves in action in battles to defend the motherland's border regions; the "flight safety red flag independent group," the "patriotic island-loving sentry in the remotest spot" and the "Karakorum steel guard post" which performed outstanding services in the modernization drive and in the struggle to defend our border regions and islands; the "good 2d Company in performing port duties" and the "good 8th Company in Gulangyu" which resisted corruption and never got contaminated in the new period and compare favorably with the past "good 8th Company on Nanjing Road"; "model in cherishing the people" Qian Demen who is clear about what to love and what to hate, selflessly devoted to public interests and serves the people wholeheartedly like Lei Feng; model in cherishing the soldiers" Dang Fanshen; who left his post for recuperation 12 years ago and has since taken root in the countryside and continued to serve the people wholeheartedly; and so forth. They are all outstanding representatives standing in the front ranks of the whole army in promoting cultural development. Under the advanced models' influence and motivation, learning from Lei Feng, emulating the heroes and models and fostering a new style have become a common practice in the whole army. In the first 6 months of this year alone, more than 100,000 learn-from-Lei Feng groups had actively worked in various urban and rural areas and done a lot of good things for the people.

In the past few years, the PLA's modernization and regularization have also scored new advances.

— As our national economy steadily moves forward, and as the level of national defense scientific research and national defense industry is being continuously enhanced, the whole army's weapons and equipment have been considerably improved, and the level of its modernization has been raised. Not only have improvements been made continuously to conventional weapons, but new developments have been made in sophisticated weapons for defensive purposes.

— The accomplishment of all PLA cadres in modern military knowledge is being upgraded more rapidly. Senior and middle-level cadres have generally received training in the conduct of campaign operations, which has markedly enhanced their military theoretical level and ability to organize and command operations with different services and arms fighting in coordination. Through training in military academies and schools and in-service training, basic-level commanders and professional and technical personnel at various levels and in different fields have mastered tactical and professional skills for combat under modern conditions. A large number of outstanding young and middle-aged cadres, after training and practical tempering, have been assigned to leading posts at the army and division levels. The composition of the PLA's cadre ranks is undergoing a historical change, advancing toward the goal of having more cadres who are revolutionized, better educated, professionally competent and younger.

-- Through strict political, military, scientific, cultural and other fields of training, the vast number of fighters' political consciousness, combat skills and scientific and cultural levels have been greatly improved. Many expert marksmen, crack gunners and technical experts have come forward.

Because the whole army's education and training are clear in orientation, and because of effective measures taken, the results are obvious, and the army's fighting capacity has been greatly enhanced. The might of the ground forces to fight a modern war has developed to a new level. Units of naval vessels have mastered the skills to go on expeditions to distant seas and the highly difficult techniques of ship-to-ship supply at sea, and have acquired the first generation of well-trained pilots for shipborne aircraft. The growth rate of air force pilots is now more than three times as fast as before, and the number of A-class regiments [jia lei tuan 3946 7352 0957], which mark the main fighting capacity of the air force flight units, have grown to several times that of the record year in history. In the past few years, various ground, naval and air force units have on many occasions organized various kinds and scales of command-organ exercises [zhi hui ji guan yan xi 2172 2264 2623 7070 3348 5045], combat exercises with live ammunition [shi bing yan xi 1395 0360 3348 5045], specialized tactical exercises and composite forces combat exercises with various services and arms and specialized units taking part, to practice and evaluate their ability to organize and command combat operations under modern conditions, coordinated maneuvers and various kinds of protections. All this indicates that our army has made important new advances and greatly enhanced its fighting capacity in coordinated operations of composite forces and in using modern means to deal with the enemy.

At present, the whole army is further summing up experience and determined to advance from victory to victory and greet the convocation of the party's 12th national congress with outstanding achievements.

WORK ON FIRST PRC-DESIGNED A-POWERPLANT UNDERWAY

OW192134 Beijing XINHUA Domestic Service in Chinese 1245 GMT 19 Aug 82

[Text] Beijing, 19 Aug (XINHUA) — The preliminary stage of construction on China's first domestically designed nuclear power station is fully underway.

With a design capacity of 300,000 kilowatts, it will be equipped with a pressurized reactor. The parameters of all of its systems and equipment are comparable with those of nuclear power stations of the same type and similar size in foreign countries.

To ensure lasting safety, a larger margin has been left in the design. Careful arrangements have been made concerning environmental protection and treatment of industrial wastes to prevent harmful effects on environmental and ecological hygiene.

The preliminary stage of construction work on this nuclear power station includes scientific research, design, preparation of a related materials supply, design and manufacture of equipment and site selection. Substantial progress has been made under the leadership and with the support of the various ministries, commissions, Shanghai City, Zhejiang Province and thanks to the concerted efforts of a great number of scientists and units concerned. Of the 264 research and experimental projects, 190 have been completed; of the 423 equipment design projects, 324 have been completed.

Construction of the first nuclear power station marks China's pioneering efforts in this field. It will help build China's nuclear power industry and help it systematically master all techniques for building nuclear power stations. Eventually, nuclear power stations will provide an effective way to solve the power shortage problem in the eastern and northeastern parts of China.

PROGRESS IN IMPLEMENTING LINE ON INTELLECTUALS

[Text] Beijing, 22 Aug (XINHUA) -- Report by XINHUA special correspondent [te yue tong xun yuan 3676 4766 6639 6061 0765]: Since the 3d Plenary Session of the 11th CPC Central Committee, gratifying progress has been made in the implementation of the policy on intellectuals. The broad masses of intellectuals are working hard on the industrial agricultural, education, science, cultural, public health, physical culture and other fronts. They are contributing their wisdom and talents to the socialist modernization of the motherland.

In recent years the party Central Committee has done a great deal of work in connection with the implementation of the policy on intellectuals. It first made a Marxist appraisal of the status and role of intellectuals in socialist society. At the national science conference held before the 3d Plenary Session of the 11th CPC Central Committee, a central leading comrade reiterated the thesis issued by the party Central Committee in 1956 saying that the overwhelming majority of intellectuals in China are part of the proletariat. The party Central Committee's 1981 "Resolution on Certain Questions in the History of Our Party Since the Founding of the People's Republic of China" reaffirmed that "together with the workers and peasants, the intellectuals are a force we should rely on in pursuing the cause of socialism." Moreover, the party Central Committee emphasized that in the course in implementing the policy on intellectuals, it is necessary to truly "treat intellectuals equally without political discrimination, boldly let them work and show concern for their well-being."

The inspection of the work concerning intellectuals conducted throughout the party in the first half of this year was an important measure adopted by our party to improve its work concerning intellectuals. The party committees at all levels have earnestly reexamined the case of injustice committed against intellectuals during the "Great Cultural Revolution" and exonerated the victims in those cases. The party committees have also redressed the wrongly judged cases handled before the "Great Cultural Revolution." As a result, the intellectuals who had suffered injustice have relieved themselves from a political burden, eased their minds and joined in the various undertakings to build socialism.

Since the 3d Plenary Session of the 11th CPC Central Committee the party has attached still greater importance to recruiting new party members from among outstanding intellectuals. In the past 3 years and more a large number of intellectuals who met party membership requirements have joined the party organization. According to statistics, Communists accounted for 22.4 percent of the specialized cadres of various categories at the end of 1981.

In the last 3 years or so a large number of intellectuals with both political integrity and organizational and leadership ability have been selected to strengthen leading groups at various levels in various localities in China. According to incomplete statistics from 9 provinces, municipalities and autonomous regions and 25 ministries, commissions and bureaus under the central organs, some 92,200 intellectuals have been promoted to leading posts at various levels during the period. In recent years great progress has been made in restoring and assigning technical job titles and in promoting technical personnel. By the end of 1981, over 1 million persons in China had received high-level and middle-level technical job titles, including those of lecturer, assistant researcher, physician-in-charge, engineer and accountant. In the past 3 years and more, organization and personnel departments at all levels have readjusted jobs for nearly 200,000 scientists and technicians by making their jobs correspond with their specialties. The organization and personnel departments have also arranged jobs for some 34,000 unemployed scientists and technicians. For the first time in China various localities have conferred doctorate and master's degrees on graduate students in accordance with the "Regulations on Academic Degrees of the People's Republic of China." Scientific research and education departments are actively creating conditions enabling scientific and technical personnel to pursue advanced studies. Some 12,000 persons have been sent to study at schools in 54 foreign countries.

While carrying out national economic readjustment, the government is paying attention to gradually improving the livelihood, pay and working conditions of intellectuals. Since 1977 the government has allowed several pay raises and upgradings and considerably increased the incomes of some scientific research personnel and teachers by issuing scientific research allowances and properly enlarging the scope of pay raises and upgradings. The central authorities are particularly concerned about wages, housing, medical care and other livelihood problems of middle-aged intellectuals. They are adopting measures within the government's financial and material capability to gradually solve the problems in a planned way. The authorities in various localities have made efforts and succeeded in solving the problem of long separations between many husbands and wives due to different working stations.

So far the implementation of the policy on intellectuals in various parts of China has been very uneven. The influence of "leftist" ideas in treating intellectuals still has to be eliminated and many actual problems still need further solution. Nevertheless, the broad masses of intellectuals have profoundly felt the impact of the great changes in the few years since the 3d Plenary Session of the 11th CPC Central Committee and have gained full confidence in the cause of socialist modernization. They are displaying their talents to the full on the various fronts. Some old intellectuals, in referring to themselves, say "knowing it is getting dark, the old ox runs fast even though no one is whipping it." They are thus encouraging themselves to work still harder and are determinated to dedicate themselves to the "four modernizations," to live up to the earnest expectations of the party and the people.

HE JIANZHANG ON CHANGES IN ECONOMIC PLANNING

[Article by He Jianzhang [0149 1696 4545]: "Planned Economy and Planned Management System"]

[Text] The planned economy is a basic feature of the socialist economy. In the past decade or so, socialist countries in the practice of planned economy have accumulated a wealth of experience. But because socialist construction is still new to the implementation of a planned economy, socialist countries are still in a period of experiementation and as yet there is no consensus as to the best model. One of our tasks, within the framework of the planned economy, is to search for a planned management system that suits our country's present stage of socialist public ownership and the degree of development of the productive forces, and, in doing so, guarantee planned proportional development of the national economy while taking full advantage of the socialist planned economy. In the past, many socialist countries implemented a highly centralized planned management system. State planning not only fixed the relationship of basic proportions on the national econpmy, but in the case of the two major categories, fixed the proportions of every production unit, including all of their interdepartmental proportions, the proportions of accumulation and consumption, and so forth. Still the state strove to use more and more mandatory targets. Specific production tasks for production, supply and marketing were issued to the various production units and enterprises were always in a state of limbo, resulting in "dependency on the state for delineation of responsibilities, dependency on the state for supplies of materials, and dependency on the state for distribution of goods." Practice has shown that there are both advantages and disadvantages to the state in implementing this kind of highly centralized, purely mandatory planned management system.

The advantages are that this kind of system can centralize the use of manpower, material resources and financial resources, so that specially designated areas of the national economy can achieve relatively rapid growth. The disadvantages are that an enterprise itself becomes a subordinate thing in all levels of state administration and it lacks independent administrative and management power. The planned responsibilities issued by the upper administrative departments are not necessarily realistic and an enterprise has no authority to correct planning. This easily leads to production being divorced from demand, goods that cannot be sold and accumulation of waste. For example, in China there are some 400,000 industrial enterprises producing several million kinds of industrial products for which planning cannot forecast accurately, not to mention keeping up with the demands of change or timely readjustment of plans. Moreover, insistence on single mandatory planning in enterprises results, first of all, in increasing the overall workload of administration, proliferation of the internal administrative structure and inflation of personnel. Second, it is difficult to make timely corrections to the problems that occur in economic life (all matters related to an enterprise, large or small, require instruction from above); hence, bureaucratism is difficult to avoid completely. As the work process becomes inefficient, economic benefits are decreased. Inefficiency in the work procress and decreased economic benefits are this kind of planned management system's greatest malady.

In the past, we frequently thought only implementation of a single mandatory plan could guarantee proportional development of the national economy. Practice has shown that this is not completely so. In the past 30 years, China's economy has suffered several great setbacks and economic development has fluctuated drastically. Of course, most of this can be attributed to the errors of leftist ideology and faulty economic policy, but the question remains, why were these errors for so long unredressed and often repeated? This is not unrelated to this kind of highly centralized single mandatory planning system because, more often than not, state policy concerns itself with fairly long range, overall profits easily overlooking immediate, local and individual profits.

Further, even if state policy was not mistaken, as an enterprise lacks independent administration and management powers, it still had no recourse to effective resistance or timely correction resulting in longstanding faults and serious losses overall. Not unrelated to this is the fact that in the past, China's proportions for agriculture, light and heavy industry were not balanced, nor was there any balance between economic construction and the people's life.

From the point of view of theory, this kind of centralized single mandatory planning system is not compatible with the characteristics of socialist public ownership. The essence of socialist public ownership is the unification of the workers with the means of production. The workers own the means of production and should therefore form the main body of administration and management. They should not only select their own representatives to participate in the management of the state, but also, in all of their enterprises, they naturally deserve administrative and management authority. This is the basis for socialist economic management. State centralized management should also be found d on this basis and should not simply formulate plans from above, then, in the form of administrative decrees, expect those below to implement them. State centralized management should reflect the interests and needs of enterprises. Of course, owing to inherent differences between socialist enterprises, from the point of view of every enterprise, all their individual needs and interests can be mutually contradictory. While state centralized management is not simply the sum of the interests and needs of every enterprise, it works to centralize their common interests and needs and coordinate their differences, so that enterprises can establish common objectives and standardize administrative activity (for all kinds of rules and regulations). From the point of view of planned management, it is important that the state strengthen its command of macroeconomics and formulate a socialist development plan to unify the economy.

The question is one of how we guarantee the realization of macroscopic planning. Before the 1950's a single mandatory plan was the norm. From the mid-1950's onward, all socialist countries carried out some reform of their economies. Some basically perserved traditional methods, but more emphasized the use of economic mechanisms; some canceled mandatory planning, relying instead on market regulation, while others decreased by degrees mandatory planned targets and enlarged the scope of market regulation, and so on. At present in China, it is not possible to implement basic reform of the economic management system and planned management system, as the whole economic structure is still in the midst of readjustment, that is, the structure of industrial organization is not sound, nor is the price structure. Proceeding from the existing conditions it may be possible to first consider partial reform. For example, in relation to the important products and large enterprises connected with the national economy and the people's livelihood, continue to issue directive plans. In relation to the unimportant commodities and the vast majority of enterprises, rely on planning of a guiding nature to take advantage of such economic levers as taxation, pricing, credit, and so forth, to lead enterprises to diligently fulfill the requirements of the state plan. This is to say, an enterprise would have authority under the guidance of state planning to independently develop economic activity. Enterprises would thus decide their own plans for production, supply and marketing according to the needs of the market. With piecemeal production, third category agricultural sideline production and peasant household sideline production, no planning responsibilities would be issued. Let the operators freely organize production according to market conditions. We must maintain firm belief that under the guidance of unified state planning, the enlargement of administrative and management decisionmaking power in enterprises will strengthen state planning and not weaken it. As an example, in the past we relied on strict mandatory planning in the rural economy, the results of which were not very promising. After the 3d Plenary Session of the 11th CPC Central Committee, the acknowledgement of the production teams' decisionmaking power in administration and management, giving peasants the power to plant crops according to the locality and season, and the practice of diversification and various forms of the production responsibility system, the prospects for a flourishing rural economy appeared, and the agricultural plan was fairly well fulfilled.

As industrial production is far more complex than agricultural production, it follows that enterprises should have even greater decisionmaking powers in administration and management. The broad masses of staff and workers struggling on the frontline or production understand better than the country's leading organs the needs of the market and the weak spots of their own enterprises' administration and management, and can therefore implement feasible improvement methods in their enterprises. The only way we can enliven the economy and better suit our industrial production to the needs of society is to expand the administrative and management decisionmaking powers of enterprises and mobilize the masses of workers' enthusiasm for work. In recent years, China has seen some comparatively outstanding results after some reform in planning management and varying degrees of enlargement of the decisionmaking power of enterprises. Last year, under state production targets, the total output value of the machine-building industry enterprises amounted to 10 billion yuan, or only about a quarter of the total production potential, which is to say, the whole industry faced the danger of incurring a loss. Those departments of the machine-building industry that changed the previous dependency on state-issued responsibilities, supply of materials and state distribution of goods, within the framework of guaranteeing fulfillment of the state plan, chose to emphasize planned guidance and the supplementary role of market regulation. In accordance with the market conditions they tapped their productive resources and enlarged their services. The result was, in 1981, the First Ministry of Machine Building's total output value amounted to 27.3 billion yuan. Not only was no loss incurred, but 3 billion yuan was turned over to the state as profit. What does this example illustrate? It illustrates that once an enterprise has definite decisionmaking power, it can begin to work from real market conditions to exploit its productive potential, and this is advantageous to the proper development of the national economy and not the opposite.

Quite simply, on the one hand, socialist production requires the whole society to formulate centralized unified planning. There must be proportional distribution of labor throughout and production must be conducted under planned regulation. Then the socialist system of public ownership of the means of production becomes a possibility. On the other hand, the socialization of production makes socioeconomic life extremely complex and it is impossible to incorporate into the state plan every enterprise's daily particulars of production, supply, and marketing. The state cannot record every phenomenon. At the same time, the socialist system of public ownership of the means of production means that socialist economic management-must rest on the foundation of the working masses' participation in the management process. State centralized unified planning must come from the bottom and go up from level to level and should not be something that is simply formulated in the high-level government departments and handed down from the top to be enforced below. Socialist planned management should be founded on the basis of enterprises' relative independence of administrative and management decisionmaking power. Government must also not weaken to the point of administering this decisionmaking power. The vitality of socialist enterprise is the creation of the masses of workers. Socialist economic management must seek to facilitate the unleashing of the masses creativity. Our economic management system and planned management system must adapt to this need. The communique of the 3d Plenary Session of the 11th CPC Central Committee reported: "The most serious shortcoming in our country's economic management system lies in the overcentralization of power. We must exercise leadership and bravely transfer it to those below, make room for industrial and agricultural enterprises under the guidance of unifited state planning to have more decisionmaking power in administration and management". The best way to fulfill this need is a planned management system that successfully integrates mandatory planning, planning of a buiding nature and free production.

YANG JINGREN PRESIDES AT MEETING ON KMT PERSONNEL

[Report by XINHUA correspondent Li Shangzhi]

[Text] Beijing, 22 Aug (XINHUA) -- A discussion meeting on the implementation of the policy toward former Kuomintang personnel who revolted and crossed over, which closed today, showed that great achievements have been made in our country in implementing the policy toward these former Kuomintang personnel since the 3d plenary session of the 11th party Central Committee. The meeting was attended by representatives of seven provinces and autonomous regions and three military regions. Of those who were incorrectly handled and wrongly sentenced in the various movements, the overwhelming majority have had their cases reexamined and redressed, and most of the personnel who needed help to settle down have been given such help. They and their families indicate now that they can cast away their ideological burden, move forward without worry and contribute to the four modernizations and the motherland's reunification.

The discussion meeting was convened in Beijing on 12 August by the leading group for implementing policy on former Kuomintang personnel who revolted and crossed over, which is comprised by six departments of the party Central Committee. Responsible persons of departments concerned in Hunan, Hubei, Sichuan, Yunnan, Nei Monggol, Xinjiang and Qinghai Provinces and Autonomous Regions and the Beijing, Kunming and Urumqi PLA units attended the meeting.

From the information gathered at the meeting, it can be seen that since the 3d plenary session of the 11th party Central Committee, the party Central Committee has attached great importance to the implementation of the policy toward the former Kuomintang personnel who revolted and crossed over and has issued special documents in this connection. Central leading comrades have given numerous instructions about this. The party committees of the various provinces, autonomous regions, municipalities directly under the central government and military regions have set up special leading groups in accordance with the guidelines of the central documents and instructions to strengthen the work of implementing the policy on the Kuomintang personnel who revolted and crossed over. In the past 3 years and more, various places have conscientiously implemented the principle that "all patriots belong to one big family; their past misdeeds should be forgiven; and they should be treated equally without discrimination, assigned jobs according to their abilities and properly taken care of in their resettlement." These places have done a great deal of work in conducting investigations to confirm the status of personnel who revolted and crossed over. They have reexamined their cases and rehabilitated them, arranged for their resettlement, provided them with social relief and so forth. Not only have the cases of the overwhelming majority of these people been reexamined and redressed, and the overwhelming majority of those who needed help to settle down been given such help, but political arrangements have been made for those who rendered outstanding services when they crossed over and who have made important contributions to the four modernizations. Social relief has been given to those in economic need. However, it is reported that the development of the work is still uneven. Progress has been slow in some places and departments. Even in places where the work is nearly completed problems still remain which need to be solved with continued serious efforts.

At the discussion meeting, the comrades talked about the conditions and problems and held lively discussions. They felt that to further and better implement the policy on former Kuomintang personnel who revolted and crossed over, the departments and people concerned must further study the party's consistent policy toward these Kuomintang personnel and the party Central Committee's instructions to raise their consciousness in implementing this policy and prevent "left" influence and interference.

Many comrades at the meeting said that the party's policy of forgiving the past misdeeds of the Kuomintang personnel who revolted and crossed over has been proven absolutely correct by practice. During the war years, our party, with its correct policy toward enemy personnel who revolted and crossed over, destroyed the enemy, strengthened itself, accelerated the progress of the war toward victory and protected the state and people's property. We also should see that all the personnel who crossed over have made contributions, great or small, and most of them wish to contribute their minds and efforts to the four modernizations and the reunification of the motherland. At the same time, implementing the policy toward these personnel is also conducive to bringing into play the enthusiasm of their family members, relatives and friends. Therefore, implementing this policy is an important part of implementing all the party's policies and an important aspect of solving problems left from history and setting things right. Making further efforts to do this work well is of great significance for bringing into play all positive factors and accelerating the process of the four modernizations and the motherland's reunification.

Yang Jingren, director of the United Front Work Department of the CPC Central Committee, presided over the discussion meeting. He stressed that all localities must fully understand the seriousness of implementing this policy and must do it well from start to finish.

Li Gui and Ling Yun, members of the leading group for implementing policy on former Kuomintang personnel who revolted and crossed over, spoke at the opening and closing of the meeting. Responsible persons of departments concerned Wang Feng, Li Ding, Wang Yantang and Zhao Shisheng attended the meeting.

GUANGDONG CONGRESS SESSION HEARS REPORTS, ENDS

Procurator on Anticrime Fight

HK230601 Beijing ZHONGGUO XINWEN SHE in Chinese 1350 GMT 20 Aug 82

[Report: "Kuo Qingyan Says the Struggle Against Criminal Activities in the Economic Field Is Being Carried Out Smoothly"]

[Text] Guangzhou, 20 Aug (ZHONGGUO XINWEN SHE) -- On the morning of 20 August, at the 18th session of Guangdong's provincial people's congress standing committee, Kuo Qingyan, chief procurator of the Guangdong Provincial People's Procuratorate, gave a report on the situation of the struggle against criminal activities in the economic field in this province. He said that the struggle is developing normally, healthily and smoothly. It has played a good role in ensuring the correct implementation of the open-door policy and the policy of enlivening the domestic economy as well as in promoting production. Concentrated efforts will be made in the future to handle serious and major cases so that the struggle against serious criminal activities in the economic field can be carried out in depth.

Kuo Qingyan said that of the 1,649 cases the people's procuratorates in this province handled in the first 7 months this year, 1,010 cases, together with 1,609 people involved, have been placed on file for investigation. Five hundred and ninety-one people were involved in 440 cases involving more than 5,000 yuan in illicit personal gains, of whom 109 were cadres at and above the county bureau level. The investigation of 618 cases, in which 968 people were involved, has been finished. It has been approved to arrest 697 criminals, including 47 cadres at and above the county bureau level, and to prosecute in court 258 cases involving 346 people. Four hundred and fifty-six people have been exempted from prosecution and some cases involving 243 people will be handled in other ways. More than 1.01 million yuan of stolen money (including stolen property converted into money) has been recovered.

Kuo Qingyan pointed out that some cases, in which some leading cadres are involved and which were not handled well for a long time in the past due to all kinds of obstructions and interference, have also been exposed and investigated this time. For example, in spite of great obstructions and interference, the defendants Li Xuezhao, deputy director of the Huiyang administrative office Guangzhou agency; Li Yaozhou, director of the commune and brigade enterprise administration bureau in Shaoguan Prefecture; and Wang Zhong, deputy director of the political and legal committee of the Shantou Prefectural CPC Committee, have been arrested according to law, and their cases are being prosecuted.

Kou Qingyan said that a large number of criminal offenders have voluntarily surrendered themselves to the judicial departments. This was rare in the past. According to statistics, 3,591 criminal offenders in the province surrendered themselves and confessed their crimes before 1 May this year. Another 604 have surrendered themselves since that date. Some businessmen in Hong Kong and Macao who had committed such criminal activities as smuggling and arbitrage also came back on their own initiative to confess their crimes, return their ill-gotten gains and pay evaded tax. They have been treated with leniency.

He continued: Through the anticorruption education, the consciousness of the broad masses of people as well as their initiative in the struggle against criminal activities have greatly been raised. The letters and visits to the procuratorates reporting economic crimes have constantly increased: In the first quarter of this year there were more than 500 letters, and in the second quarter there were more than 1,800 letters. From these letters quite a few economic criminals were discovered. Some of them were even serious and major cases.

Kou Qingyan siad: "Through hitting at economic criminals, the social atmosphere and public order have further been improved. Since the economic criminals have been fightened in this struggle, criminal activities such as smuggling and selling smuggled goods, speculation, profiteering, and so on have been reduced by a big margin. In those areas where smuggling and selling smuggled goods were originally prevalent, the unhealthy tendencies have basically been checked and stopped. Ohter criminal cases have also been reduced by 21.3 percent over the corresponding period of last year."

He said that it is necessary to firmly grasp the serious and major cases in the future so that efforts can be concentrated on the handling of these cases. Prompt investigation and handling of the serious cases which have fairly great influence and danger have an important bearing on the success of this struggle. He said that the investigation of more than half of the cases which the procuratorial organs in this province have placed on file for investigation has already been finished. Of these cases, 105, which are serious and major cases, have been prosecuted in court. In August, some other cases will also be prosecuted so that the struggle can be steadily developed in depth.

HENAN PEOPLE'S CONGRESS SESSION CONVENED

Opening of Session

HK210418 Zhengzhou Henan Provincial Service in Mandarin 1100 GMT 20 Aug 82

[Summary] The Fifth Session of the Fifth Henan Provincial People's Congress opened in Zhengzhou on 20 August. The session will examine and approve Governor Dai Suli's government work report and various other work reports submitted to it. The session is being attended by 1,183 people's deputies representing the province's 70 million people. The participants in the fifth session of the fourth provincial CPPCC committee attended the opening ceremony as observers. Session Executive Chairmen Liu Jie, Zhao Wenfu, Zhang Shude, Yu Yichuan, Hu Shangli, Song Yuxi, Guo Tan and others were present. Liu Jie declared the session open.

Governor Dai Suli then delivered his government work report, which was in three parts: "1) New progress has been made in building the two civilizations; 2) completely fulfill this year's national economic plan; and 3) the political guarantee for achieving the four modernizations." He proposed the following five tasks to be grasped in a concentrated way during the remainder of this year: "1) Further perfect and improve the production responsibility systems and strive for a bumper autumn harvest; 2) continue to lay the stress in work on improving economic returns, to ensure steady industrial growth; 3) do a good job in shipping industrial goods to the rural areas and strive to improve finance and trade work; 4) vigorously develop science and technology and provide better service for economic construction; and 5) proceeding from serving the people in everything, make all-round arrangements for production, construction and the people's livelihood."

Dai Suli proposed that the following four major tasks be grasped in order to uphold the socialist road and politically ensure the smooth progress of the four modernizations: "1) Seriously carry out reforms of the administrative structure and the systems; 2) vigorously promote the building of socialist spiritual civilization; 3) deal resolute blows at serious criminal activities that sabotage the socialist economy and the socialist system; and 4) straighten out the ranks and strengthen leadership."

Governor Dai Suli announced in his report: The province reaped a bumper summer grain harvest this year. "Total output reached 22.7 billion jin, an increase of 470 million jin over the great bumper year of 1981 and a record. Although the sown area of rapeseed was smaller than in the previous year, output rose by 10 percent. Last winter and spring the province carried out afforestation on 1.65 million mu and planted 260 million trees around houses and villages and along roads and rivers." Total output value of commune and brigade enterprises has increased by 20.2 percent compared with the same period last year. The whole countryside is a scene of prosperity.

He pointed out: The province has scored major victory in fighting floods. He said: The province had several periods of heavy rainfall beginning in mid-July. Numerous flood crests occurred on the Huang, Huai, Hongru, Rusha, Yiluo and other rivers. In particular, parts of the province had as much as 800 mm of rain between 29 July and 4 August. The flood crest at Huayuankou on the Huang He reached 15,300 cubic meters per second, the greatest in 24 years. Due to the torrential rains and the duration of the floods, some embankments on tributaries were broken, and villages and farmland were inundated. Some 1.5 million armymen and people were urgently mobilized along the Huang and Huai to fight the flood. After 20 days of hard struggle, they ensured the safety of the embankments along the rivers and the safety of the large and medium reservoirs, and have won great victory in the struggle against flood. Party and government leaders went to the frontline to direct the struggle, and the PLA personnel worked hard in rescuing the masses and strengthening antiflood projects.

Governor Dai Suli also spoke on the industrial situation. He said: "This year the province has seriously implemented Premier Zhao Ziyang's 10 principles on economic construction proposed in his government work report, corrected the guiding ideology for industry, centered work on improving economic returns, and persistently grasped returns and speed simultaneously. The province has straightened out 531 industrial enterprises, further readjusted the product mix, launched technical improvement, and effectively promoted the development of industrial production. Total value of output in the first half of the year was 10.54 billion yuan, representing 49.3 percent of the year's quota, and 12.7 percent greater than in the same period of last year. Light and textile industries increased by 11.9 percent and heavy industry by 13.7 percent. Collective industries under the No 2 light industry system in the urban areas recorded a 10.6 percent increase. Economic returns showed some improvement. Labor productivity increased by 7.8 percent compared with the same period last year, while income from sales rose by 13.2 percent and profit by 12.7 percent."

Governor Dai Suli pointed out: "The province's capital construction front has continued to implement the principle of acting according to our capability. We have controlled the scale of capital construction, readjusted the investment orientation, shortened the construction cycle, the further improved the results of investment. This year the province's capital construction investment is 1.437 billion yuan. Some 590 million yuan worth of this was completed in the first half of the year, showing an increase of 9 percent over the same period last year."

Dai Suli said: Henan has further developed internal and foreign trade. The urban and rural markets are becoming daily more prosperous. Net purchases by the province's state-owned commerce system in the first half of the year amounted to 5.63 billion yuan, 12.8 percent more than in the same period of last year. Total net sales amounted to 7.048 billion yuan, a rise of 7.9 percent. Retail commodity sales in society reached 6,568 billion yuan, a rise of 11.1 percent. Prices have been stable. Summer grain procurement has been carried out well. Procurement for foreign trade in the first half of the year was 480 million yuan, an increase of 1.5 percent over the same period of last year. Exports were worth $133 million, a rise of 7 percent.

In the first half of the year the province found jobs for 92,000 urban young people awaiting employment, representing 46 percent of the year's plan."

Dai Suli said: "The province has fully launched the struggle against serious crime in the economic field, and this is now gradually developing in depth. In the course of this struggle the government at all levels has seriously implemented the series of instructions of the CPC Central Committee and the State Council, strengthened leadership and focused on major and important cases." A number of major cases have now been exposed. In particular, the public handling of the cases of profiteering in motor vehicles by the Anyang grain center and the sabotage of socialist economy by former Baofeng County CPC Committee Secretary Li Zhenhua has educated and encouraged the cadres and masses. In addition, a number of criminals have turned themselves in.

Governor Dai Suli said: The province has made a fine start in building spiritual civilization. This year Henan has launched the "five stresses and four beauties" drive and the civility and courtesy month and linked eduation in communist ideology with solving current practical problems in society. The results have been very good. Large numbers of progressive figures have come to the fore, and are being emulated.

The province has also scored successes in cultural, educational and other work. "In planned parenthood work, a number of major indices in the population plan have been fulfilled relatively well in the new conditions of a peak in births. The rural planned parenthood work network has basically taken shape. We have initially reversed the passive situation of blind increase in population."

Tasks Outlined

HK230325 Zhengzhou Henan Provincial Service in Mandarin 1100 GMT 22 Aug 82

[Summary] Governor Dai Suli said in his government work report: "We must correctly handle the relationship between economic construction and people's living standards, uphold the 10 principles for economic construction, and maintain a definite growth rate in the national economy on the basis of improving economic returns. We must stick to the principle of regarding planned economy as the primary factor and regulation by market mechanism as supplementary, and maintain the dominant position of state-owned economy while developing a diversity of economic forms. We must maintain the policy of opening up to the world and actively expand external economic and technical exchanges."

Governor Dai Suli said: "In order to fulfill this year's national economic plans, we must stress the following tasks in the next few months:

"1. Further perfect and improve the production responsibility systems and strive for a bumper autumn harvest. This is the current central task in rural work. At the same time, the province must carry out all preparations for sowing wheat.

"2. Continue to focus work on improving economic returns and maintain steady growth in industry." He stressed: "Seven months of this year have already elapsed, and there is not much time remaining. We must have the concept of time and a sense of urgency. We must persistently grasp economic returns and growth rate simultaneously, make some breakthroughs in the field of economic returns, and strive for a sound growth rate without any padding.

"3. Do a good job in shipping industrial goods to the rural areas and strive to improve finance and trade work.

"4. Vigorously develop science and technology and provide better service for economic construction.

"5. Proceeding from serving the people in everything, make all-round arrangements for production and construction and the people's daily lives."

Speaking on the political guarantee for achieving the four modernizations, Governor Dai Suli stressed: "We must uphold the four basic principles in accomplishing the broad target of socialist modernization. The most important of the four basic principles are: 1) uphold the socialist road and 2) uphold party leadership. In order to uphold the socialist road and politically ensure the smooth progress of socialist modernization, we must unswervingly do a good job in four major items:

"1. Seriously do a good job in reforming the administrative structure and the systems. Governments at all levels must follow the instructions of the Central Committee and State Council and, under the leadership of the provincial CPC committee, actively do a good job of preparatory work for reforming the government organs.

"2. Vigorously advance the building of socialist spiritual civilization." At present it is necessary to conduct education in communist ideology for the cadres and masses. Mass drives should be launched to learn from progressive figures such as Zhao Chune.

"3. Deal resolute blows at serious criminal activities that sabotage the socialist economy and the socialist system. At present, we must concentrate forces on tackling major and important cases, and deal with them quickly and severely. We must be impartial and incorruptible in dealing with those who do serious economic sabotage, no matter who they are. Partiality and protection for them is absolutely forbidden.

In the struggle to hit at serious economic crime, we must also solve problems of occupying state property and looting state material, and the problem that has appeared in some places where the peasants seize the chance to take advantage of the stage. We must resolutely put a stop to these unhealthy trends.

"4. Straighten out the ranks and strengthen leadership. Under the leadership of the party committees, the governments at all levels must seriously straighten out their ranks, improve their leadership style and methods and properly shoulder their heavy burden of leading economic construction. All levels and all departments must set up job responsibility systems from the leading cadres down to the ordinary work personnel." He said: "We must seriously implement the regulations for state organ work personnel, and resolutely correct the bad tendencies of passing the buck, procrastination, and lack of responsibility in work. We must teach the cadres to respect discipline and law and correct unhealthy trends. The leading cadres and work personnel must strive to revive and carry forward the fine traditions of the revolutionary war years and the early post-liberation period of sharing weal and woe with the masses and working hard amid difficulties. They must regularly go deep among the masses and into reality to investigate and study, sum up experiences, and strive to transform the work of the organs."

SICHUAN RIBAO EDITORIAL URGES PROPER USE OF LAND

HK210611 Chengdu Sichuan Provincial Service in Mandarin 0030 GMT 21 Aug 82

[Report on 21 August SICHUAN RIBAO editorial: "Cherish Every Inch of Land and Use it Rationally"]

[Excerpts] The Sichuan provincial land management provisional regulations approved by the 16th session of the provincial people's congress standing committee constitute an important law for improving and strengthening land management in the province. The promulgation and institution of these regulations will play a positive role and have a far-reaching effect in stimulating the province's people to cherish and rationally use the land resources, carrying out comprehensive harnessing of the land in a planned way, improving the economic returns of land utilization and gradually building an excellent ecological situation.

Cherishing and rationally using every inch of land is urgently needed in our province. As everyone knows, Sichuan has a large population and little arable land. This arable land has been further reduced in recent years. Due to the great increase in population, the available arable land per person has declined from 2 mu in the early post-liberation period to 1 mu at present. This latter figure is one-third below the national average. In addition, due to ineffective land protection measures in recent years, indiscriminate tree-felling and land reclamation and other damage to soil and water resources have been rather serious. As a result soil erosion is continuously occurring on much of the province's land, causing ecological imbalance. If this situation develops, it is bound to seriously endanger our four modernizations and also do harm to our posterity. Proceeding from cherishing and rationally using every inch of land, the provincial land management provisional regulations embody the following principles: 1) uphold socialist public ownership of land and stabilize and protect land ownership rights; 2) strengthen unified state management of land, stress the comprehensive harnessing and rational use of land, protect the land, use it economically, and prohibit waste and damage of land resources; 3) on the basis of subordination to the unified plans for land exploitation and utilization, take account of the interests of the state, the collective and the individual when allocating land for construction purposes; and 4) clearly stipulate reward and punishment clauses.

SICHUAN IMPROVES AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTION

[Summary] Sichuan has rapidly revived and developed agricultural production since the smashing of the gang of four and especially since the 3d plenary session of the 11th Central Committee. In the past 5 years the province has increased grain production by 39.4 percent and also achieved relatively fast development in diversification. At present the rural areas are a scene of prosperity.

The province produced 61.26 billion jin of grain in 1978, an increase of 11.59 billion jin over 1976. From 1979 to 1981 grain output rose by an annual 4.2 percent. Total output last year was 69.31 billion jin. This year the province achieved an increase of 15 percent in spring grain harvest, despite a reduction of 1 million mu in the sown area, while rapeseed output rose by 30 percent. At present the spring-sown crops are growing well and a bumper harvest is in sight. During the past 3 years total value of agricultural output has risen by an annual average of 5.6 percent, while that of forestry, animal husbandry, sideline production and fisheries has risen by an annual average of 21.2 percent. In 1976 the people's grain ration in the province was only 369 jin, and many of the masses did not get enough to eat. Last year average grain distribution from the collective was 552 jin, and the total ration exceeded 600 jin when produce of private plots and surplus production are included. Last year the peasants received on average over 85 yuan from collective distribution, an increase of 13 yuan over 1978. Their income from domestic sideline occupations rose even faster.

NGAPOI NGAWANG JIGME VISITS XIZANG LOCALITIES

HK210236 Lhasa Xizang Regional Service in Mandarin 0000 GMT 19 Aug 82

[Text] Ngapo Ngawang Jigme, vice chairman of the NPC Standing Committee and chairman of the people's government of the autonomous region, in disregard of hardships, carried out investigation and studies in Rikaze, Zajia, Jiangzi and Yadong Counties after entertaining King Bihendra of Nepal. Vice Chairman Ngapo, who is 71 years old, visited rural and pastoral areas, organs, schools, factories, hospitals, residents' families and border sentry posts, making extensive contact with workers, peasants, PLA fighters, cadres, teachers, medical personnel and local residents. He sincerely heard their opinions, proposals and demands on government work and gave a series of important instructions on present tasks. Vice Chairman Ngapo said: Since the implementation of the instructions on work in Xizang issued by the Central Committee, tremendous changes have taken place in the situation of Xizang in the past 2 years. Agricultural and animal husbandry production has developed day after day, and the people's living standard has been raised gradually. During the investigation, I have seen that the situation of our region has improved year after year. The slogan "make a small change in 3 years, a medium change in 5 years, and a great change in 10 years," recently put forward by the regional CPC committee, is in line with practical situation of our region. The people throughout the region should strive to realize this slogan. In order to change the poor and backward situation of Xizang, we should rely first on the party's principles and policies; second, on the masses of people; and third, on the efforts of the grassroots cadres. This year, various localities have suffered natural clamity. This can be resolved by other remedial measures. For instance, the cadres in (Xiasima) town of Yadong County gave full play to the wisdom of the masses, opened up more production prospects and established 14 collective enterprises. Thus they not only augmented people's earnings, but also provided jobs for some personnel.

Referring to strengthening unity between the people and the PLA and safeguarding the border areas, Vice Chairman Ngapo remarked: To improve relations between the people and the PLA in Xinzang means to improve the relations between Tibetan and Han nationalities. This is because comrades of Han nationality make up the majority of the commanders and fighters of the units stationed in Xizang. They garrison the border areas of the country. They live a very hard life. They garrison the border areas day and night in order to safeguard socialist construction and the tranquility of the people. We should take great care of them and cherish and help them. Our comrades in the PLA should also carry forward the good tradition of the People's Aamy in supporting the government and cherishing the people, wholeheartedly serve the people of all nationalities of China and make contributions to defense and construction in the border areas.

Referring to the transfer of Han cadres, staff and workers to the interior, Vice Chairman Ngapo said: The third transfer to the interior should be kept under strict control by the various units. Professional and technical personnel and backbone leaders needed by Xizang should resolutely stay here. Party organizations at all levels should help those who are to remain in the region to gradually overcome the difficulties they are facing. As for the comrades who are to be transferred to the interior, we should conduct good political and ideological work so that those who are to be transferred will happily leave the region, and those who stay will feel at ease while remaining.

Referring to united front work, Vice Chairman Ngapo stressed: The united front has always been a magic weapon of the party, and still is. Our patriots should bring into play their special role, actively reflect the opinions of the masses to the party, put forward their own proposals, and make concerted efforts to do a good job in Xizang.

Vice Chairman Ngapo expressed his great concern for Tibetan compatriots abroad. He said: When a man grows old, he becomes homesick; when a bird grows old, it flies back to the forest. Now, the number of people who come home to visit their families or settle down is increasing. We bid them welcome. We should unite and make common efforts to build the socialist motherland.

Referring to religion, Vice Chairman Ngapo said: To respect and protect the freedom of religious belief is the party's basic policy toward religion. There is a lack of successors to carry on the religious work of the old lamas in the temples. It is necessary to accept new and young lamas, but problems will arise if too many are accepted. The departments concerned should strictly keep this under control. The duty of lamas is not only to recite scriptures but also to raise their cultural level, to protect cultural relics and to study Buddhist theory. We hope that religious circles will make efforts to do a good job in this respect.

Vice Chairman Ngapo said: During my trip, I have seen that party organizations at all levels and local governments have done a lot of work in implementing the instructions of the Central Committee on Xizang's work, and have made considerable achievements. We hope that leading groups at all levels will strengthen their unity, work still harder and make more contributions to realize the goal of "realize a small change in 3 years, a medium change in 5 years and a great change in 10 years."

TIANJIN URGES OBSERVING ECONOMIC DISCIPLINE

SK200950 Tianjin City Service in Mandarin 0030 GMT 20 Aug 82

[Unattributed commentary: "Cast Away Selfish Desire, Enforce Discipline"]

[Text] Whether discipline is enforced or not has an important bearing on the success of the revolutionary cause. Major cases of economic crimes have once again exhorted the people, state cadres in particular, to pay constant attention to observing discipline and law. The policy of opening our doors to foreign countries on the basis of adhering to the principle of maintaining independence and keeping the initiative in our own hands and the policy of stimulating the economy while upholding the socialist planned economy are policies the state cadres should know very well. Moreover, there are many specific regulations and disciplinary restraints that serve as a guarantee for the implementation of the party's economic policy. Certain people, however, have intentionally distorted the party's economic policy, defied the regulations and wrecked discipline, to the great damage of the state. It can be safely supposed that Yang Yibang, the dismissed former vice minister of chemical industry, was perfectly aware of the disciplinary regulations governing external activities. However, he did not observe them. (Yu Zhaohong) and others of a group affiliated with the Tianjin import and export commission went so far as to practice fraud and pass off inferior goods for quality ones. They violated even the most rudimentary discipline. As is shown by the economic crimes that have come to light recently in Tianjin, many people succumb to their selfish desire to violate discipline. Coveting petty gains, they demand and take bribes in total disregard of repeated injunctions and iron-clad discipline.

Selfish desire is the original intention of economic offenders. However, the selfishness and the greed for petty gains on the part of some cadres constitute an internal cause for violating discipline. Left to their own devices, they will take the road of crime, as is shown by many cases in the past. Socialist discipline is for safeguarding the interests of the party, the country and the people. Those who have the interests of the party, the country and the people on their minds will not feel that the discipline is restrictive. On the other hand, those who put their own interests above everything else and are obsessed with the desire for gain will feel that the discipline is so restrictive that it hampers them in properly performing their official duties and attending to personal business. Economic offenders can easily compromise such persons.

It is really distressing to see that the moral character of a party member and state cadre is easily bartered away for small bribes and that small personal gains are made at the great expense of the state. There is an old saying: Do not take a single hair of what does not belong to you. Cadres in our socialist country must be honest in performing their official duties, make demands on themselves in line with the principle of serving the people and be sure to cast away selfish desire and enforce discipline.

U.S.-PRC COMMUNIQUE, U.S.-TAIWAN RELATIONS VIEWED

Understanding Communique Urged

OW200156 Taipei International Service in English 0100 GMT 19 Aug 82

[Text] President Reagan knows about communism. He has spoken out on this subject many times, both before and after his election. Regretably, Mr Reagan doesn't know that there isn't much difference between the Chinese communism and Russian communism. If he recognized that these two communists are birds of a feather, the United States would not be continuing to negotiate with Red China about Washington's relations with the Republic of China on Taiwan. This relationship is none of Peking's business. That was made clear when the United States and Chinese Communists exchanged recognition. The United States said that it was going to continue the Taipei relationship and assure the defense of Taiwan. This was subsequently written out and expressed in the Taiwan Relations Act.

The Chinese Communists were fully aware of the limitations applying to their U.S. ties. They objected, but went ahead anyway, thus implying acceptance.

The exchange of recognition took place when Jimmy Carter was president of the United States. Mr Reagan then defeated Mr Carter and entered the White House. The change of presidents frightened the Chinese Communists. President Reagan had made clear that he was a friend of the Republic of China and said that he would improve the relationship with the free Chinese. So, right after Mr Reagan's election, the Chinese Communists undertook a campaign to drive a wedge between the new American chief executive and the Republic of China. The Chinese Communists said they couldn't be friendly with a country which accepted and assisted the Republic of China. This worried some of President Reagan's advisers. They say the Red China card has value in the struggle against the Russian communists. Possibly, Mr Reagan accepted the idea of negotiating arms sales to Taiwan as a way of placating the Chinese Communists. He may have thought the talks could be dragged out inconclusively without changing anything.

But the Chinese Communists are persistent and tricky. They have kept up the pressure on the United States for a long time. They have threatened to downgrade relations with the United States unless the Americans curtail, and eventually discontinue, the sale of arms to the Republic of China.

According to sources both in Washington and Peking, a deal is being worked out. The United States would reaffirm its recognition of only one China; it might imply that Peking was that China. The arms sales would be limited as to quantity and quality. In one way or another, the United States would stipulate its intention to discontinue the sales entirely in time to come.

This would be a very dangerous concession on the part of the United States. The Chinese Communists will never be content with the mere disarming of the Republic of China. What they want is Taiwan and are determined that the United States is going to help them get it. If the United States accepts Peking's demand for the cessation of arms sales, the Chinese Communists will proceed to their next objective. That will be for negotiations with the Republic of China for what the communists call peaceful unification. Even before these negotiations, the communists would insist the Republic of China liquidate itself and that the people of Taiwan accept Peking's sovereignty. What hope for the survival of a free China would be left after that? The offer of autonomy will be meaningless. If Taiwan resisted communization, the troops of the Chinese Communists would move in.

President Reagan needs to be informed that the Chinese Communiss have the same intention towards the Republic of China on Taiwan as the Russian communists have towards Afghanistan. The Chinese Communists' threat to the free people of Taiwan is much greater than the Russian Communists' threat to the people of Poland. A great tragedy could be in the making, not to mention a sizeable war in the Taiwan Strait. For the people of free China, it would be better to be dead than red. American appeasement of Red China on Taiwan can only lead to war that inevitably will involve the United States.

Reexamining Intentions Stressed

OW220636 Taipei International Service in English 0100 GMT 22 Aug 82

[Text] By now everyone presumably knows what has been called the Shanghai communique No 2 or Shanghai mark II between the United States and Red China. Most interpretations have emphasized the gradual reduction of arms sales to the Republic of China on Taiwan as the most important provision of the communique. In the view of the Chinese Communists, this may not be quite so. Washington and Peking also agreed to adopt measures and create conditions conducive to a thorough settlement of the arms issue. This is an opening to which the Chinese Communists are likely to press incessant demands for quick action. They would protest every time the United States delivers so much as a rifle. They would threaten to downgrade relations, as they had before, unless the United States complies with their demands.

Another serious provision is U.S. acceptance of the Chinese Communists' peace overtures to the Republic of China as sincerely intended. They are not. In fact, there have been no real peace overtures to the Republic of China, which the Chinese Communists intend to destroy. The overtures were made to the people of Taiwan and the Kuomintang, the ruling party of the Republic of China. As either a nation or a government, the Republic of China was never mentioned. From the beginning, the Chinese Communists have proposed that the Republic of China surrender or simply fade away. The elements of autonomy promised to the Kuomintang or the people of Taiwan would then become meaningless. People cannot exercise autonomy; they must have governing authority through which to express themselves. That is where communist intentions enter the picture. The communists would provide the government with authority. Autonomy would cease right then and there, just as happened when the Chinese Communists marched into Tibet.

So the United States has given at least unintentional support to the communization of Taiwan. There could be no other results in the unification of China on communist terms. This is a shocking concession, considering President Ronald Reagan's total rejection of communism. Mr Reagan surely cannot believe that the Chinese Communists are good and the Russian Communists are bad. He reacted angrily to U.S. media reports that Washington has reversed its policy of arming Taiwan. The chief executive said the United States will continue to sell arms to the Republic of China. Yes, but for how long and under what conditions?

The communique pressures the United States to work for a final resolution of arms sales to Taiwan as quickly as possible. The Republic of China hopes Mr Reagan will interpret that as meaning no termination so long as Taiwan is in danger. But the United States has said in effect that Taiwan is not in danger because the Chinese Communists want to make peace. Where is truth? Where is justice? The United States has come very close to saying that Taiwan belongs to the Chinese Communists and that it will not interfere with Peking's efforts to assert its sovereignty.

President Reagan should read the communique carefully. He may not be aware of all implications. He is also duty-bound and honor-bound to compare the communique with the Taiwan Relations Act, which is not merely an executive agreement but a law of the United States enacted by the Congress and signed by the president. The Taiwan Relations Act says: Defensive arms shall be supplied for the defense of Taiwan. In does not link this defense to any peace overtures of the Chinese Communists. In fact, the Taiwan Relations Act is clearly directed at the possible aggressiveness of the Chinese Communists in the wake of their recognition by the United States.

The Taiwan Relations Act upholds the continuing freedom of the people of Taiwan. The new communique says nothing about their freedom and seems to imply U.S. belief these people will be better off under communism. President Reagan may have wrought differently from his intention. He should reexamine the intention and words which have led him to this point.

Comment on 'Moral Relationship'

OW220306 Taipei Domestic Service in Mandarin 1200 GMT 21 Aug 82

[Station commentary: "The Value of Human Nature Lies in the Awakening of Conscience"]

[Text] The joint communique published by the United States and the communist bandits on 17 August not only has aroused our indignation, but has caused anger and condemnation among many just people in the United States. In particular, President Reagan, in addition to issuing a statement (?on the communique), made the unprecedented move of personally telephoning the CBS news editor, asking him to make a correction to the station's news report and pointing out their improper descriptions. He solemnly stated that the United States has a moral obligation to the Republic of China, and that he has not retreated or changed. Yesterday, many U.S. congressmen jointly signed a document inviting President Chiang of our country to visit the United States. Leaders of U.S. political parties also proposed inviting our country's high-ranking government officials to visit the United States.

From these events, we can at least discover that there are distinctly different ideas about us and about the communist bandits in the minds of Americans. They feel that they have a moral relationship with the Republic of China, and that the relationship between them and the communist bandits is one of practical interests. This difference merits attention, because a moral relationship endures, while a relationship of interests is temporary. Moral failures lead to a feeling of remorse and a desire to make up. By contrast, in a relationship of interests, when interests no longer exist, the two sides can part company any time and think no more of each other thereafter.

We feel this is the bright side of human nature. The United States is a democratic country, a free country, and a place where the people can think and express themselves. When their expressions are wrong, it is caused mainly by lack of understanding. When they really see things clearly, the will correct themselves. The most conspicuous examples are two recently published (?books) exposing the truth about the communist bandits' tyranny -- (?"Escape From Hell" and "Writer From the Forbidden City"). The authors are both students of the communist bandits' spokesman John King Fairbank. They both have been left-leaning reporters who heaped praises on the communist bandits with their eyes closed. However, when they went to mainland China and clearly saw the real facts, their precious human conscience completely manifested itself. They not only wrote the most truthful, objective, penetrating and impartial reports, but also frankly corrected their mistakes. They frankly pointed out their (?guilt) in being blindly left-leaning due to a lack of understanding. They frankly stated that when they saw their past articles blindly acclaiming the communist bandits, they could not help blushing.

From these examples, we should realize that the world and particularly the United States does have unclear and even contrary concepts of us, but more important, we should give some thought as to why their concepts of us are unclear or even exactly the opposite of what we really are.

In the past, there were a number of left-leaning elements associated with the Communist International such as Fairbank, Snow [words indistinct] and so forth. In their capacity as scholars, experts, reporters and authors, and posing as China experts, they specialized in advertising the Chinese Communist bandits and worked to destroy the image of the Republic of China. They created a one-sided situation in news reporting, making it impossible for Americans to know the truth about China. This state of affairs lasted for a considerably long period of time.

After the establishment of diplomatic relations between the United States and the communist bandits, the younger generation of American intellectuals, who had been influenced by the left-leaning elements and were filled with illusions, began to have opportunities to go to mainland China to (?observe and study). They found a mainland China completely different from what they thought it was. They turned and looked at us, and found that we are not as ugly as the left-leaning elements described us. By comparison, they came to realize that we had all the time been treated with indifference by them. Thus, precious human conscience found its emergence among the American intellectuals, who had a sense of justice to begin with but were only deceived by the left-leaning experts and scholars.

This was a favorable turn. Then, however, there emerged in the United States a group of elements of the so-called Taiwan independence movement who frenziedly tried by hook or by crook to vilify the Republic of China. Thus, the moribund American left-leaning elements (?became active again) by smearing the Republic of China. [Words indistinct] subjected to all unfairness, our nation is being faced with difficulties. [Words indistinct] as President Chiang Ching-kuo recently said: We pay close attention to national harmony and unity. We should fight a battle of wits and not contend with others on account of personal grudges. Where there is a will there is a way.

Our will is to wipe out the diabolical communist bandits, to deliver our compatriots on the mainland from their despotic rule and to reunify and build China in accordance with the three people's principles. Patience is a most valuable quality, but it is also limited. We must be patient in order to accomplish our anticommunist mission of national recovery. Our basic national policy is opposing communism and trying to recover the mainland, which must not be jeopardized, and this is the limit of our patience.

In a speech to scholars, a few days ago President Chiang said: We must not yield to the communist bandits' peace conspiracies and united front tactics, nor must we be perplexed by the transient international situation. Full of national confidence, we should bring our moral courage into full play, [words indistinct] and further close our ranks.

We should follow these encouraging remarks in the face of the enemy's sabotage activities and the perplexing international situation. What some American personages have done reflects the awakening of human conscience and shows the value of our patience. But, more important, we Chinese should always keep firmly in mind (?the distress we have been subjected to). In the face of the distress, we should all exercise restraint while working for the interests of the nation. Each of us should be full of national confidence and give full scope to his moral courage. Only thus will our exercise of patience (?for the time being) be of value.

We believe that man has a conscience. After acquainting themselves with the actual state of affairs, the American people are upholding justice for us. Are the elements of the Taiwan independence movement who are bent on damaging the image of the motherland really conscienceless and completely devoid of morality? Have they really forfeited all their human nature? We hope that they will soon come to their senses and take a stand based on national dignity and confidence.

OFFICIALS VIEW RELATIONS WITH U.S., ARMS SALES

[Text] In Taipei, there have been no signs of rejoicing over the sale of the 60 F-5 fighters by the Reagan administration. Both the Foreign Ministry and the Defense Ministry declined comments on the $240-million arms deal, but an official who asked not to be identified said: The decision was made in January, so it does not give us any excitement, but we can see the timing was arranged in such a way to pacify us.

Premier Sun Yun-hsuan has urged the Ministry of National Defense to accelerate its development of advanced technological weapons in a bid to reach self-reliance in the near future. Responding to the recent announcement of Reagan's decision to limit future arms sales to the Republic of China, as agreed to in a joint communique between Washington and Peking, the premier called upon all related government units to take active measures to ride over the difficulties the nation currently faces. Sun emphasized the importance of diversifying the sources from which the Republic of China receives its weapons.

Minister of Defense Admiral Sung Chang-chih gave a report on the present status of the Republic of China's weapon sources. He reported that that since the suspension of formal diplomatic ties with the United States, U.S. arms sales to Taiwan have been limited. However, he noted that future U.S. arms sales hinge on continued smooth relations with Washington.

At a meeting of the Executive Yuan, the director of the Government Information Office, James Soong, said the announcement of the joint communique between Washington and Peking have provoked negative reaction amongst both liberal and conservative members of the U.S. Government and many had expressed their sympathy towards the position held by the Republic of China. Soong reported that 3 of the United States largest television networks have sent reporting crews to Taiwan and the government should take advantage of this opportunity to communicate its position to the visiting reporters to promote a better understanding.

The premier [as heard] also said at the meeting that the Republic of China must still strive to improve relations with the United States, however, at the same time, it should intensify its efforts to strengthen its ties, both official and unofficial, with other countries.

WEN WEI PO COMMENTS ON SOONG MEI-LING'S LETTER

[Editorial: "Commenting on Soong Mei-ling's Open Letter to Liao Chengzhi"]

[Text] The publication of Liao Chengzhi's letter to Chiang Ching-kuo has evoked strong repercussions in the world. This is because this letter upholds justice and affects people. In this letter, for the peaceful reunification of China, Liao Chengzhi gently asked Chiang Ching-Kuo, his brotherly old colleague, to treasure this opportunity, follow the correct path of "rendering meritorious service to the motherland and having a good reputation go down in the annals of history," and bury the hatchet to complete the great cause of the reunification of the motherland. This letter speaks earnestly, out of a sense of justice, and is irrefutable. Thus, the Taiwan authorities were forced to find a way to deal with the situation. They could not but seek help from Soong Mei-ling, who is now living in the United States. However, when we read Soong Mei-ling's open letter to Liao Chengzhi, we cannot help but feel disappointed.

Except for the main theme of advising Liao Chengzhi to follow his father's will, Soong Mei-ling's approximately 3,000-character letter has done its utmost to vilify the CPC. If any comment is to be made on this letter, we would like to say that it reverses history, evades the sense of nationalism and attacks others out of a party's selfish interests.

It is common knowledge that history exists objectively and should not be distored. In those years when they assisted Dr Sun Yat-sen in carrying out the democratic revolution, both Liao Zhongkai and He Xiangning were well-known for resolutely supporting Dr Sun Yat-sen's reorganization of the KMT and formulation of the three revolutionary principles of cooperating with the Soviet Union, cooperating with the Communist Party and supporting the peasants and workers. These principles added new vitality to the KMT and provided a revolutionary basis for the first cooperation between the KMT and the CPC, thus bringing about the situation of "jointly fighting against domestic warlords and resisting foreign powers." History shows that both Liao Zhongkai and He Xiangning were firm leftists. In her letter, Soong Mei-ling also had to admit that they did make outstanding contributions. Since the firm leftists were faithful disciples of Dr Sun Yat-sen's three people's principles, they were not tolerated by the rightists, who pretended to be revolutionary but actually wanted to usurp the party power and abolish the three great principles of cooperating with the Soviet Union, cooperating with the Communist Party and supporting the peasants and workers. Hence, the assassination of Liao Zhongkai soon after Dr Sun Yat-sen died of disease in Beijing. The history of the KMT during this period marked the beginning of the betrayal of the revolution by the KMT rightists. It is really ridiculous for Soong's letter to prettify Chiang Kai-shek by saying that "when again mentioning the meritorious deeds of Mr Liao Zhongkai at the Whampoa Military Academy, the former president was so deeply grieved that he could not hold back his tears." When He Xiangning courageously carried out the unfinished tasks of Dr Sun Yat-sen and Liao Zhongkai and, together with Soong Ching-ling, engaged in the indomitable struggle against the KMT rightists, and when Liao Chengzhi carried out his father's behests and firmly joined the revolution, they again became intolerable to the KMT rightists. Hence, the imprisonment of Liao Chengzhi in the dark jail. In Chiang Kai-shek's eyes, there was only the purpose of eliminating the dissidents. How could he keep old friendships in mind? It was a result of the resolute struggle of the CPC that the situation was changed and that Chiang Kai-shek was forced to release some political prisoners. How could it be the case, as mentioned in Soong Mei-ling's letter, that he would not have been set free "if the former president did not cherish old friendships?" Such a reversal of history is no more than an attempt to deceive the world by covering up mistakes and resorting to sophistry. As to the advice in this letter, which is a Confucian point of view, that Liao Chengzhi should carry out his father's behests and become a worthy son by betraying the revolution, it is more absurd. Liao Chengzhi has carried out his father's behests and has become a revolutionary and politician in our times. This is, indeed, an expression of filial piety.

When the relationship between father and son was referred to in "Hsun Tse," which was a work of the Confucian school, there were three principles, and one of them was "not bringing humiliation to one's father." Both father and son in the Liao family have made meritorious contributions and are respected by the people of the world. How can their deeds be denied by vilifiers?

What merits Soony Mei-ling's deep pondering was nothing other than the life story of Soong Ching-ling and He Xiangning. They were loyal to the revolution and loyal to the motherland and the people. They made light of difficulties and dangers, vowed to adhere to their chosen courses and, finally, made brilliant contributions to national independence and emancipation. They proved themselves to be heroes crowned with eternal glory. Soong Mei-ling, who is old and is living in another country, might as well review the humiliating history of the Chinese nation over the past century or so and then look at New China, which stands like a giant in the East. It is appropriate for her to do her bit for the reunification of the motherland and for the future of the Chinese nation and try her best to urge Chiang Ching-kuo to strive for the realization of the great cause while she is still alive, so that her good reputation can go down in history like those of Soong Ching-ling and He Xiangning. If she does this, she will certainly "be respected by the whole country and be held in esteem by the people." Wise people are not likely to do otherwise and try to cover up past mistakes with sophistry, even in old age.

Besides, in Soong's letter, there are attacks against others out of a party's selfish interests. For example, it attacks the CPC for "altering the name of the country." In the struggles against imperialism and colonialism over the past century or so, who was correct and who was wrong, and who gave meritorious service and who made mistakes? How can all this be concealed from the people? It was not under the "name of the ROC" that the Chinese nation freed itself from the rule of colonialism and that China became one of the powerful countries in the world. On the contrary, it was under the name of the PRC led by the CPC that a new chapter was opened in Chinese history. Facts speak louder than sophistry. If the "name of the country" is to be used to judge between right and wrong, then after the "ROC" came into being, there were continuous tangled fights between warlords and continuous foreign invasions; there were endless occurrences and unequal treaties which humiliated the Chinese nation and people, and the people were living in dire poverty. If such a "name of the country" were not abrogated through revolution, the Chinese people would certainly suffer endless disasters and misfortune. Dr Sun Yat-sen cherished high aspirations throughout his life to save the Chinese nation and people, to "abrogate all unequal treaties" and to strive for "national freedom and equality." His aspirations have now been realized. If Soong Mei-ling had no prejudice and were not partial to the KMT, why should she speak of the "name of the country?"

Soong's letter did not care about national interests and the reunification of the motherland. This is another example of the fact that it was partial to a party. We hope that Soong Mei-ling will keep a clear head and be realistic in considering the future of China so that she can make a wise choice and do something good -- something that will be highly spoken of throughout the ages -- for the country and the Chinese nation in her old age, that is, to urge the Taiwan authorities to accept Ye Jianying's nine-point proposal for peaceful reunification and the principles in Liao Chengzhi's letter so that reunification can be realized and China can be revitalized.

Looking at the other side of the vast Pacific Ocean, we are placing sincere hopes on Soong Mei-ling.

JOURNAL DISCUSSES ISSUE OF HONG KONG'S FUTURE

HK191331 Hong Kong KUANG CHIAO CHING in Chinese No 119, 16 Aug 82 pp 6-7

[Article by KUANG CHIAO CHING reporter Li Yueh [2621 4766]: "Hong Kong, Still a Hong Kong for Hong Kong People -- An Interview on Resolving the Future of Hong Kong"]

[Text] Capitalism Under the Five-Starred Red Flag

Since the Chinese Communist leaders met in succession several prominent figures from Hong Kong in the past few months, talk of regaining Hong Kong has caused a temporary clamor. The subject of "regaining sovereignty and keeping Hong Kong prosperous" has become a hot topic of conversation among people. But too many comments and remarks will probably overshoot the truth and turn geese into swans. In order to [word indistinct] truth, since the beginning of last month, reporters have interviewed some prominent figures in Beijing and Hong Kong. Here is a brief report on the subject.

From such interviews, this reporter came to understand and can say with conviction that reclaiming sovereignty over Hong Kong has become a policy decision of the Chinese Communists. No change will be made on this decision. This has been revealed in some public journals which can be found in Hong Kong. The deadline of the reclamation has not yet been specified, but a draft for solution to the issue has been brewing for some time and a plan will be worked out before long. An inference can be drawn from this reporter's observation and analysis that the discussion of the plan is not now restricted to the top-level quarters. This reporter also strongly feels that the plan for the solution will be the approach of "operating two different systems within one country," an approach that has been widely rumored recently. That means that Hong Kong will be governed by Hong Kong people under the five-starred red flag. This approximately coincides with the prediction of "capitalism under the five-starred red flag" made in issue No 118 of this magazine.

Hong Kong People Will Still Be Allowed To Enjoy Their Colorful Night Life

This reporter was definitely told in an interview: When Hong Kong's sovereignty is reclaimed, Hong Kong's status as a free trade port and international financial center will be maintained. The Hong Kong dollar will maintain its international standing. Hong Kong will be allowed to keep its power to conclude separate economic agreements with other countries of the world, such as the present multifiber agreement. The territory's economic and legal systems will be maintained and even the lifestyle of the Hong Kong people will be kept intact. In a word, when Hong Kong is regained, apart from the Union Jack being lowered and the five-starred red flag being hoisted in its place, and the British governor being replaced by a Chinese (probably the term "governor" will no longer be used), Hong Kong will remain Hong Kong. Its people will still be allowed to enjoy their colorful night life, talk about the stock and gold markets, or act as estate agents. It will seem like nothing has happened. At first hearing this, this reporter was greatly surprised. Though the interviewee said he spoke from a personal point of view, his status and position are indisputable. His assertiveness showed that he already had some well-thought-out ideas in mind and had mastered the essentials of policy.

However, this reporter's train of thought was really confused. A string of question marks welled up in his mind. Is it really possible?

The first question which had come to mind was about some of the most basic commic knowledge. If Hong Kong's status as a free port is to be maintained, one of the prerequisites is that freedom of trade and freedom of entry and exit be guaranteed. Will people from places like South Korea and Taiwan be able to come and leave as they do now?

"Of course, their coming and going must be guaranteed. But Chinese from the mainland will still be restricted from entering Hong Kong."

The following are answers to some more questions posed by this reporter.

There is a positive side to Hong Kong's laws. The majority of the laws will be retained, and will only require minor revisions. Hong Kong can set up its own supreme court of appeal. It is not necessary to take cases to London or Beijing. Everything can be solved in Hong Kong.

The Hong Kong and Shanghai Banking Corporation and the Chartered Bank can continue to issue currency. But there will probably be no queen's picture on the new bank notes. It will not be necessary to look for any portraits from Beijing either. It is better to make a design with marked Hong Kong traits.

Opposition papers and journals can continue to be published if they have a mind to. Dissidents can still engage in their activities provided they do not break the law.

"If a group of people who are not satisfied with reality intend to initiate riots by claiming that they are responding to calls from the motherland, will the central authorities allow the local administration to suppress the riots?" This reporter was sorry to rudely put forward such a question and put it bluntly by using a strong word like "suppression." But he cannot be blamed too much for this because this reporter was, at the time, just thinking of the 1967 riots. Though the situation then was different, and the 1967 riots resulted from historical reasons and practical conditions prevailing at that time, no one could bear to see any riots when Hong Kong is regained by China.

"There will be a parliament in Hong Kong, with the right to adopt motions." On hearing this, this reporter came to understand that the local administration would have the right to decide all internal affairs when the territory is regained.

Since the news of reclaiming Hong Kong's sovereignty was spread, like the majority of Hong Kong people, this reporter has been very perplexed and uneasy. Not only should Hong Kong be kept prosperous, but its economic system also should be changed. How would it be possible to keep with the hare and run with the hounds? This reporter even thought that the news itself had damaged the prosperity of Hong Kong. Hong Kong people are well informed about everything. Once bad news comes, money can be immediately remitted abroad. However, in the course of the interview and conversation, doubts began to be cast away. A ray of hope and a modicum of excitment have appeared.

Looking for a Lee Kuan Yew-Type Person in Hong Kong

In another interview, the subject of our conversation was on the problem of Hong Kong's future chief.

The problem was put forth because this reporter still felt a bit uneasy, though a beautiful prospect had been portrayed in the previous interview. This resulted from doubts as to the continuity and stability of policies formulated by the authorities. From past experience, this reporter is used to taking a "wait-and-see" attitude toward such problems. Therefore, on being asked for views on the solution to Hong Kong's future, this reporter spoke frankly: Since the news of reclaiming Hong Kong's sovereignty is in the air, everyone is talking about the matter. The majority of people agree to the approach of regaining sovereignty. But just as some people say, your boss can be trusted, but your shop assistants cannot be trusted. This means the party's policies are correct, but their implementation is always susceptible to change. This is also on people's minds looking at the future of Hong Kong.

The reply to this problem was clear enough, namely, the Chinese always do what they say. Though some bad things occurred during the Cultural Revolution, the situation has become stable since the third plenary session. "We are full of confidence," he said. Then he also sincerely told this reporter: "You can rest assured. We will not station People's Liberation Army units or dispatch naval vessels. Hong Kong's public security can be maintained by the present police. Except for defense and external affairs, all other affairs can be handled by the Hong Kong people themselves. No officials of ours will join the local administration. But the future governor must be replaced. It would be unreasonable to ask a British subject to act as the governor of China's Hong Kong. The governor can be elected locally, or his election may have to be confirmed by the central authorities." This highly-placed authoritative person also said: "It is not necessary for the governor to be an advocate of socialism. Now we put patriots into two categories. One is to advocate the socialist motherland; the other is to agree to reunification of the motherland. Anyone can be qualified for governor if he agrees to the approach of regaining Hong Kong's sovereignty, and has the necessary prestige and capability."

How will the existing officials below the level of governor be arranged? "Most of them will be allowed to stay. The capable can still be employed as officials or advisers. The welfare system will be maintained."

"Then shall we look for a Lee Kuan Yew-type person in Hong Kong?", asked this reporter bluntly. "Yes, it can be said so. A Lee Kuan Yew for China's Hong Kong."

Undoubtedly, this interview greatly encouraged this reporter. Of course, there are still many questions. One of them is how to guarantee China's approach. In spite of this, an outline for the future of Hong Kong has been drawn up. But how to color it in, to perfect the outline, enrich its contents and develop its vitality, all this should be done by the Hong Kong people themselves. The Hong Kong people must master their own destiny and take advantage of all opportunities to make their ambitions come true. It is useless to avoid reality. Signing in despair will waste one's life. Keeping silent is a loss. This reporter believes that Hong Kong's people now have a lot of things to do. A brisk discussion must be held on Hong Kong's future.

USSR'S USTINOV RAPS U.S. STANCE AT ARMS TALKS

[Text] Moscow, August 19 (XINHUA)--Soviet Defence Minister Dmitriy Ustinov today attacked the U.S. for sticking to its "zero option" proposal at the half-year-old Geneva talks on nuclear arms limitation in Europe, saying that such proposal was "designed to torpedo the reaching of agreement."

Answering questions raised by a TASS correspondent, Ustinov criticized the United States for "disclosing" and "distorting" the content of the talks. He said that the Soviet Union proposed to create "a vast European zone of the reduction and limitation of nuclear arms" in which the existing medium-range nuclear weapons of both the Soviet Union and NATO should be reduced to no more than 300 units in the coming five years after an agreement on this is reached. He explicitly pointed out that all types of medium-range nuclear weapons would be subject to reduction -- both missiles and planes and that deployment of nuclear weapons of new types including American "Pershing-2" missiles and cruise missiles in the zone would be prohibited.

He insisted that there exists a parity of both nuclear and conventional forces between the U.S. and the Soviet Union as well as between the Warsaw Treaty organisation and NATO. He accused the U.S. of trying to attain nuclear superiority.

Ustinov's remarks show once again that no substantive progress has been made in the Geneva talks as both sides remained adamant on their respective stand.

SFRY'S MOJSOV ON NONALIGNED MEETING VENUE

OW230747 Beijing XINHUA in English 0708 GMT 23 Aug 82

[Text] Belgrade, August 22 (XINHUA) -- Yugoslav Federal Secretary for Foreign Affairs Lazar Mojsov said this evening that a consensus had been reached on the need for the seventh non-aligned summit conference to be held in some other country than in Baghdad. Speaking in an interview with Belgrade television, Mojsov said that the consensus was reached after intensive consultations among all the non-aligned countries. India had agreed to host the gathering, he declared.

Mojsov said that what remains to be achieved is to reach an accord on how to formally confirm the consensus on the transfer of the seventh summit from Baghdad to New Delhi, and to decide "in which place, if it is necessary, should a meeting of plenipotentiaries of the heads of state or government, be held" for the purpose.

The foreign secretary hoped that the remaining difficulties about the way in which this accord should be formally confirmed would be resolved in the next few days.

He said that the president of the Yugoslav Federal Presidency, Petar Stambolic, and presidency members Cvijetin Mijatovic and Radovan Vlajkovic had held talks with leaders of many non-aligned countries. The result showed that Yugoslavia had played a favourable role in the rapprochement of views of the non-aligned countries and in avoiding the contradictions around this new consensus.

BEIJING REVIEW REAFFIRMS OPPOSING HEGEMONISM

HK230932 Beijing BEIJING REVIEW in English vol 25, 9 Aug 82 p 3

[Text] IT IS SAID THAT IN CHINA OPPOSING HEGEMONISM IS USED AS A SYNONYM FOR OPPOSING THE SOVIET UNION. WHAT DO YOU THINK?

[paragraph published in boldface]

[China still upholds Chairman Mao's theory of the three worlds in its foreign policy. Opposition to hegemonism is one of the three basic points of China's foreign policy (the other two are: strengthening the unity and cooperation among the Third World countries and safeguarding world peace). We oppose anyone seeking hegemonism anywhere and support all countries that suffer from hegemonist expansion.

The tense and turbulent world situation stems from the contention between the two superpowers, the Soviet Union and the United States. However, as the Soviet Union is on the offensive and the United States is on the defensive in their contention, the major threat to world peace today comes from the Soviet Union. In 1968 the Soviet Union sent its troops to occupy Czechoslovakia. More than two years ago, it invaded and occupied Afghanistan. It also supported Vietnam's invasion of Kampuchea and stepped up its own southward drive for control of the Persian Gulf and the Indian Ocean. China directs the spearhead of its struggle against hegemonism towards the Soviet Union not only because the Soviet Union stretches its hands everywhere, but also because it attempts to achieve its goal of aggression and expansion by flaunting the banner of socialism, styling itself as the "natural all" of the Third World countries and pursuing its own aims under the cover of "supporting" the struggle of the people of the Third World. Soviet hegemonism is therefore very deceptive. Today this is understood by more and more countries and people.

China's focus on opposing Soviet hegemonism does not mean that it does not oppose the hegemonism of the United States. China's foreign policy is a principled and independent one. Although the strength of the United States has been weakened compared with the past, it still seeks hegemonism. For instance, it always supports South Africa's schemes to obstruct the independence of Namibia in opposition to the broad masses of African people. In the Middle East, it stubbornly supports Israel in opposition to the just demands of the Arab people. Aided and abetted by the United States, Israel has recently sent troops to invade Lebanon, slaughtering the innocent Palestinian and Lebanese people. In Central America and the Caribbean region, the United States supports reactionary dictatorial regimes and suppresses the people's movements for national liberation. In the Korean peninsula, it refuses to withdraw its troops from South Korea, obstructing the peaceful reunification of Korea. As for China, the United States continues to sell arms to Taiwan and interferes in the internal affairs of China. We resolutely oppose all these hegemonist deeds by the United States.

The situations in the Third World countries differ greatly. Nowadays, when the world situation is becoming more turbulent, some Third World countries oppose the Soviet Union, while others direct the spearhead of struggle against U.S. expansion and interference. All countries decide their own policies for the struggle against hegemonism and where the spearhead of their struggle should be directed according to their own specific situations and conditions. China respects their policies.

Some Third World countries receive aid from the Soviet Union because of domestic reasons and their needs in the struggle against the United States. This is understandable. However, China's own experiences show that they should guard against the Soviet Union using its aid to manipulate and control them. The struggle of the Third World countries for national independence and liberation is aimed at driving away the colonialists who ride roughshod over them. It should never allow new interference from outside.

China firmly supports the struggles of Third World countries against imperialism, colonialism, hegemonism and racial discrimination and wishes to strengthen its unity and cooperation with other Third World countries, except Cuba and Vietnam, because these two countries have become tools of the Soviet hegemonists in pushing the latter's policy of aggression and expansion.

UNESCO DISCUSSES POPULATION CONTROL IN SHANGHAI

OW240207 Beijing XINHUA in English 1518 GMT 23 Aug 82

[Text] Shanghai, August 23 (XINHUA) -- More than 30 officials, activists and specialists representing 10 Asian countries met in Shanghai today to study the population issue, which has become a matter of world concern. The women are attending a 12-day training course in social communication for women professionals in population programs co-sponsored by UNESCO and Asia-Pacific Institute for Broadcasting Development (AIBD) that opened today in Shanghai, the biggest city in China.

Representatives from Bangladesh, China, India, Indonesia, Malaysia, Nepal, Pakistan, the Philippines, Sri Lanka and Thailand are participating.

Huang Ganying, vice-president of the All-China Women's Federation, presided over the inaugural ceremony. She stressed that the control of population growth is China's fundamental national policy. "We are to persist in this policy for a long time to come," she said.

As a result of government effort and support from the people, the family planning program has reported great progress in China. The birth rate declined from 1970 to 1981, dropping from 30 to 18 per thousand.

Yang Kai, deputy mayor of Shanghai, welcomed the participants to see for themselves the participation of Shanghai women in the national development and population programs, as well as working to solve remaining problems.

Yang Yunyu, vice-chairman of the Chinese National Commission for the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization, said the course is a cooperation program of great importance between China and UNESCO.

Yvette Abrahamson, program specialist of population division of UNESCO, Brajesh Bhatia, regional training coordinator of AIBD, addressed the course. Participants in the course will discuss population policies, exchange experience in communication techniques and strategies in population programs and study the role of women in the national development process wtih special reference to information, communication and education activities in support of population program.

Nessim Shallon, resident co-ordinator of the United Nations System's Operational Activities for Development, joined the course in the afternoon session.

Representatives of the UN Fund for Population Activities and the International Planned Parenthood Federation came from Beijing to attend today's opening ceremony. A reception was given by the All-China Women's Federation and the Shanghai Women's Federation in the evening.

Zhang Wenjin Address

OW121101 Beijing XINHUA Domestic Service in Chinese 1630 GMT 11 Aug 82

[Text] Vienna, 11 Aug (XINHUA) -- On the afternoon of 11 August, Zhang Wenjin, chairman of the Chinese delegation, addressed the second UN conference on the exploration and peaceful uses of outer space. In his speech, he stated China's views and principled stand on the exploration and uses of outer space.

Zhang Wenjin said: "China's consistent stand is that the exploration and use of outer space must serve a peaceful purpose, that they must advance the economic, scientific and cultural development of the various countries and promote equality and friendly cooperation among the various nations. The interests of all countries, particularly those of the developing countries, must be taken into consideration when exploring and using outer space."

Reviewing the rapid progress in space science and technology in the past 14 years since the convocation of the first UN conference on other space, he continued: "Since the development of space science and technology, some issues have arisen, much to our concern. We hold that the important task of this conference is to seriously consider and resolve these issues and enable the peaceful use of outer space to proceed along the correct path."

Zhang Wenjin said: "Space science and technology, a component part of all of man's science and technology, is the common asset of mankind which ought to be shared by the people of all countries. However, the current situation is that the developed countries are dominating the field of space science and technology. With a population of over 70 percent of the world population, the developing countries account for only 5 percent of all scientific and technological research and development projects. In the field of space science and technology, the gap is even bigger."

"By the end of 1981, all together 2,700 or more satellites and spacecraft had been launched in the whole world, but more than 90 percent of them belonged to the two space superpowers. The enormous gap between the various countries in space science and technology has led to inequality with regard to the rights enjoyed and interests shared by them. The developing countries cannot enjoy, as they should, the benefits brought about by man's exploration of outer space despite the increasingly extensive application and practical achievements of space science and technology. This is an issue that merits our attention. However, owing to historical and other reasons, the developing countries still have much difficulty in resolving this issue. Therefore, the international community should make concerted efforts toward this end. The United Nations and its specialized agencies should play a greater role in helping developing countries to improve their space scientific and technological level and their competence in applications. The developed countries with their advanced technology, particularly the space superpowers, should assume greater responsibilities."

In his speech, Zhang Wenjin also pointed out: "In recent years, the international situation has been turbulent and the hegemonists have intensified their armaments and their war preparations. Even once quiet outer space has now become an arena of intense rivalry and arms race. Outer space is the common environment of mankind. To ensure that the exploration and use of outer space serve a peaceful purpose, practical and effective measures must be taken to prevent outer space from becoming a new arena of the arms race.

"Therefore, in discussing the important issues with regard to the peaceful uses of outer space, the conference must also discuss the issue of prohibiting an arms race in outer space. Measures must be taken to stop and reverse the dangerous trend of having an arms race in outer space. This is the common wish of all peace-loving people throughout the world."

Zhang Wenjin concluded: "China is a developing socialist country. It has consistently pursued a peaceful foreign policy in international affairs. Over the past years, China has made efforts in the exploration and use of outer space while vigorously developing its economy. Presently, China's ability to develop outer space is limited, but it is willing to engage in the peaceful use of outer space and contribute to the welfare of mankind with its achievements in space and technology. We are willing to promote international cooperation, including cooperation with the developing countries, as far as our limited capability allows. We are willing to join consultations on the basis of equality with delegates of other nations and to make utmost efforts in helping solve the issues facing the conference."

On the morning of 11 August, the conference showed a film of speeches by the winners of five regions in a composition contest on "outer space explorations" for middle school students. The title of the composition contest sponsored by the United Nations was: "How Space Activities Are Changing the Outlook of My Country and the World."

An article entitled "Best Wishes for Your New Home," written by Fu Jie, a female student at China's Wuhan municipal school of foreign languages won first place for the Asian zone. The film on her speech lasted 5 minutes. The winners of the four other regions were students of Algeria (for the African zone), the Soviet Union (for the East European zone), Argentina (for the Latin American zone) and Norway (for the West European nations and other countries).

Conference Concludes

[Text] Vienna, August 21 (XINHUA) — The second U.N. conference on the exploration and peaceful uses of outer space today stressed the need for cooperation in space science and technology and for the peaceful uses of space. A report adopted at the end of the conference this afternoon said that it is necessary to continue and expand cooperation in space science and technology. It is also important that all countries have access to benefits from new applications of space science and technology, it said.

Describing the arms race in the outer space as a matter of grave concern to the international community, it said that the maintenance of peace and security in outer space is of great importance for international peace and security. The prevention of an arms race and hostilities in outer space is an essential condition for the promotion and continuation of international cooperation in the exploration and use of outer space for peaceful purposes, it stated.

The report urged all nations in particular those with major space capabilities to contribute actively to the goal of preventing an arms race in outer space and to refrain from any action contrary to that aim.

Addressing the closing session of the conference, Willibald Pahr, president of the conference and Austrian foreign minisster, expressed his gratification at the achievements of the conference. But he regretted that cooperation at the conference is paralleled by an unprecedented effort to develop and even deploy weapons that would threaten peace in space. He called for the creation of a world-wide awareness of the need to ensure that outer space remained a peaceful environment.

HOLBROOKE WRITES FAVORABLY ON JOINT COMMUNIQUE

[Text] Washington, August 22 (XINHUA) -- The China-U.S. joint communique on the settlement of the issue of U.S. arms sales to Taiwan "can allow the further development of common strategic and political interests" of both countries, said Richard Holbrooke, former U.S. assistant secretary of state for East Asian and Pacific affairs, in an article carried by the Washington POST today. "This is essential to our national security in the face of Soviet adventurism in Southwest Asia and elsewhere," he noted.

He said that after a year of searching for alternatives, President Ronald Reagan concluded that every other possibility was too damaging to U.S. interests. The communique was "probably the best the administration could have extracted from a difficult and dangerous situation."

Had the talks with the Chinese Government failed, Holbrooke believed, "the result would have been a major blow to our world position, with only the Russians -- not even Taiwan -- as the beneficiary".

The former assistant secretary of state said that everything else is a secondary consideration. "The important fact is that by signing this communique, President Reagan has preserved the momentum in Sino-American relations."

He hoped that all those who supported the 1972 Shanghai communique and the 1978 communique that led to the normalization of relations between the two countries should support the new China-U.S. joint communique of 1982.

THAI, SINGAPORE PRESS PRAISE JOINT COMMUNIQUE

OW221708 Beijing XINHUA in English 1611 GMT 22 Aug 82

[Text] Beijing, August 22 (XINHUA) -- Some Thai and Singapore newspapers have issued editorials or commentaries in the past few days, exclaiming the signing of the China-U.S. joint communique.

These newspapers also called on the Reagan administration to repeal the "Taiwan Relations Act" and effectively implement the principles of the Shanghai communique so as to enable Sino-U.S. relations to develop in a good direction.

The Thai newspaper THE NATION REVIEW said in an editorial on August 18: "We are very pleased" over certain agreements reached between China and the United States on U.S. arms sales to Taiwan, Taibei leaders should realize that no one would believe the myth that the Kuomintang is the legal government of China.

THE BANGKOK POST said in an editorial on August 19 that the dispute between China and the United States over the issue of U.S. arms sales to Taiwan has been over. This is a matter for rejoicing.

The NEW CHINESE DAILY NEWS said in an article on August 18 that after the release of the China-U.S. joint communique, Sino-American relations will undergo a sound development.

The paper pointed out in another article on the following day that if President Reagan really values Sino-U.S. relations, he should pluck up courage to resist the pressure from the rightists and effectively implement the principles of the Shanghai communique.

SING SIAN YIT PAO stressed in an editorial on August 19 that since the Reagan administration recognizes that the issue of Taiwan is an internal affair of China, the effect of the "Taiwan Relations Act" will inevitably diminish gradually.

The Singapore newspaper THE STRAITS TIMES said in an editorial on the same day that for the United States "the framework of Sino-American cooperation built up slowly since the Shanghai Communique in 1972 has been preserved." "For reasons of national dignity it (China) could not have acquiesced to U.S. arms sales to Taiwan," the editorial added.

U.S. GROUP SAID TO SUPPRESS MUSHROOM IMPORTS

OW211350 Beijing XINHUA in English 1213 GMT 21 Aug 82

[Text] Washington, August 20 (XINHUA) -- The U.S. International Trade Commission will have a hearing and make a ruling on August 24 over the American Mushroom Institute's petition that mushroom imports from China have disrupted American markets. The petition, filed on June 30, alleged that imported canned mushrooms from China had brought heavy damage to American mushroom growers. It asked the U.S. Government to hold down the imports and cited a section of the 1974 Foreign Trade Act to justify the unreasonable demand.

At the same time, in an effort to exert pressure on the government, the U.S. press has made a fuss on the issue, claiming that mushroom imports from China have led many U.S. firms to bankruptcy.

The United States is a traditional mushroom importer. Before 1980, 90 per cent of America's mushroom imports came from South Korea and other places. Mushroom imports came from South Korea and other places. Mushroom imports from China began to increase only in 1980 when China enjoyed the most favored nation treatment. Even so, China's canned mushrooms only account for 31 per cent of the U.S. imports.

Last year, U.S. mushroom imports declined by 25 per cent because of its tariff protections, while domestic production only dropped by 5 percent due to the effect of the economic recession. It is entirely groundless to talk about so-called damage to the U.S. mushroom industry by imports from other countries, still less from China.

Chinese mushrooms are better than those of other suppliers, including American producers. They are welcomed by U.S. consumers despite their higher prices. The quality of U.S. mushrooms is comparatively low, causing production to fall.

Moreover, some of the U.S. canned mushrooms were found poisoning, and the producers were punished for it or had to declare bankruptcy. But this has nothing to do with Chinese mushrooms.

The institute's petition has met with criticism from U.S. mushroom importers and people who uphold justice. Bart Fisher, a lawyer for Nature's Farm Products of Hayward, California, said in a statement that the petition is "an economic absurdity and represents a blatant misuse of the foreign trade laws of the U.S. The domestic mushroom industry secured tariff protection in 1980 against all mushroom imports under section 201 of trade act."

"To place yet another burden on the PRC would amount to rank discrimination against China and would severely undermine future efforts at U.S.-China trade," he stated.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES PASSES TAX INCREASE BILL

OW201220 Beijing XINHUA in English 1200 GMT 20 Aug 82

[Text] Washington, August 19 (XINHUA) -- U.S. House of Representatives approved today a 98.3 billion dollar tax increase bill which President Reagan has requested, thus avoiding a confrontation between the President and his conservative allies in Congress over the issue.

103 Republicans, many of whom earlier had voiced opposition to the bill, joined 123 Democrats to pass the bill. 118 Democrats and 89 Republicans voted against.

The bill is an effort by Reagan to hold down the fiscal 1983 deficit, which the administration estimated recently at 115 billion dollars. The new legislation which covers the next three years will mean higher taxes on cigarettes, telephone service and travelling; reduced medical deductions; withholding on interest and dividends and cuts in some time-honored tax breaks for business.

The new bill would produce the largest peace-time tax increase in the nation's history, only one year after Congress and Reagan agreed on a measure cutting taxes by 750 billion dollars over five years -- the biggest tax reduction ever.

When President Reagan asked Congress to support this new tax increase bill late last month, many conservative Republicans and business groups accused him of reversing the course from the tax-cut agenda he presented to the nation last year.

Therefore, Reagan has unleashed a torrent of activity in the last two weeks designed to ensure Congressional approval. On Monday he made a final appeal to the nation before the voting in Congress for public support. It is believed that there should be no difficulties for the Senate to vote for the bill.

After the voting in the House, Reagan thanked his backers, saying that "this vote does not mark the end of the crusade to get our country's economy moving again" but it is an important step.

AFP: Hu Yaobang Comments

OW232040 Hong Kong AFP in English 1849 GMT 23 Aug 82

[Excerpt] Beijing, Aug. 23 (AFP) -- Chinese Communist Party Chairman Hu Yaobang said today that China "greatly appreciated" Japanese Premier Zenko Suzuki's policies and did not confuse them with the revision of Japanese textbooks that has triggered outrage here. "There is a cloud over our relations with Japan," Mr Hu told AGENCE FRANCE-PRESSE in reference to the row over the toned-down accounts of Japan's wartime past.

But Mr Hu stressed that Mr Suzuki, who is scheduled to make an official visit to Beijing next month, was not the target of Chinese anger. The party chairman clearly put all the responsibility for the revision of the textbooks on "militarists," adding that "if they wish to create chaos, not only China but plenty of other countries will get annoyed."

Vice Foreign Minister Qian Qichen told AFP today that there was no question of canceling the Japanese leader's visit to China. "Mr Suzuki will be welcome," he said. Nevertheless, he had harsh criticism for those who tried to "falsify history."

"These Japanese think they can give themselves a better image, but they have achieved just the opposite. That is why China has protested and the Chinese people will never be able to accept it," Mr Qian said.

RENMIN RIBAO 14 Aug Article

HK140752 Beijing RENMIN RIBAO in Chinese 14 Aug 82 p 6

["Newsletter from Japan" by Chen Bowei [7115 3124 1792]: "The Whole Story of the Japanese Textbook Revision"]

[Text] The Japanese Education Ministry distorted history and prettified militaristic aggressive war in its recent screening of school textbooks, thus stirring up a storm of protest and denunciation. This appears to have been a sudden event, but in fact it takes more than 1 day for a river to freeze to a depth of 3 feet, and an undercurrent opposed to the tide of history has been creating a disturbance in Japan for a long time.

Before the end of World War II, all primary and secondary schools in Japan used textbooks designated by the state, and the children were inculcated with militarist education. After the war, in the circumstances of the time, Japan introduced a certain degree of democratization in education, and the system of having textbooks designated by the state was abolished. The basic education law passed by the Diet on 31 March 1947 included the democratic principles "respect for the dignity of the individual" and "respect for academic freedom." There should have been relatively great freedom in compiling and publishing textbooks in accordance with this law. However, while the basic education law was being promulgated another law was also promulgated -- the law on school education. According to certain clauses and regulations in this latter law, textbooks used by primary, junior and senior secondary schools were to be officially screened. The law establishing the Education Ministry in 1949 laid down that one of the jurisdictions of the ministry was to "carry out the screening of school textbooks." In this way, although the textbooks were compiled and published by nongovernmental circles, the power to screen the books was held by the Education Ministry.

Many textbooks have been declared "not up to standard" since this screening started in 1948. The majority of the "opinions on revision" put forward by the Education Ministry regarding social science textbooks (including those on history, politics, economics, ethics and so on) concern historical facts and major issues of right and wrong.

For instance, on finding passages criticizing militarism and external aggression, the Education Ministry either demands that they be cut out or else made more ambiguous. The "guidelines" put forward in 1966 by the Education Ministry for textbooks, and other documents, demanded that the books stress the position of the emperor, the cultivation of "the concept of respect and love for the symbol (i.e., the emperor) (of the country)," and the inculcation of the students with "the sense of a mission of external expansion."

In screening the textbooks, the Education Ministry has done everything possible to conceal the aggressive nature of the foreign wars launched by Japan. For instance, the Japanese militarists called the aggressive war they launched "the greater east Asia war," and also described this war, which they launched to seize colonies, as a war "to achieve national independence in Asia." The Ministry of Education put forward the following "opinions on revision" in screening junior secondary school social science textbooks in 1966: "The Pacific war was certainly not a historical period. At that time it was called the greater east Asia war. It is better to call it the greater east Asia war." With regard to the passage "because of the Pacific war, Japan brought immeasurable pain and disaster on the peoples of Asia," the Education Ministry gave this view: "Today, when the opinion has emerged that (this war) opened the opportunity of independence for the peoples (of Asia), it is unnecessary to write (the above passage) again." Moreover, in this "opinion on revision," the Education Ministry also denied that wartime Japan was fascist and complained that some textbooks "seem to regard Italy, Germany and Japan all as fascist, whereas Japan was not fascist. In addition, this way of handling the issue takes the viewpoint of world history, and is not Japan's standpoint. It is necessary to write on the basis of Japan's standpoint."

These moves by the Education Ministry have consistently been criticized and resisted by scholars and experts taking part in compiling the textbooks and also by the teachers. They hold that the Education Ministry's actions have encroached on "academic and publishing freedom" and have violated the democratic principles in the constitution. Some scholars even hold that the system of having the Education Ministry screen the textbooks is itself a violation of the new constitution. For many years the Japanese education workers union has consistently squabbled with the Education Ministry, sternly demanding that the ministry change its textbook screening system and allow people true "freedom" in compiling and distributing school textbooks.

The tendency to distort history and prettify militarism in school textbooks is not an isolated phenomenon. It reflects a certain political tendency and trend of thought in Japan.

After the end of World War II, defeated Japan instituted bourgeois democratic reforms to a certain degree. The prewar and wartime autocratic military rule was forcibly ended. However, militarist thinking, deeply rooted in the social soil, was by no means eliminated. It has occupied some people's minds like a nightmare. In the view of certain people in the ruling class, textbooks are tools for reviving and cultivating militarist ideology. In August 1955 some people in the Democratic Party, the forerunner of the Liberal-Democratic Party, published a well-known document entitled "Worrisome Textbooks," which lashed out at textbooks compiled and published by nongovernmental circles. In March 1956 the Liberal-Democratic Party submitted a "Law on Textbooks" to the Diet in an attempt to strengthen state control over textbooks. Although this law was not passed, control over textbooks was in fact strengthened after that time. This situation lasted until the early 1970's.

After the beginning of the 1970's, as the Liberal-Democratic Party continually lost favor and seats in the general elections, a situation of so-called "little difference between conservatives and reformers" appeared in the Diet. The Liberal-Democratic Party's ability regarding revising the constitution and controlling school textbooks did not equal its ambition, and it had to draw in its horns somewhat.

Dramatic changes began in the second half of 1980. This was because the Liberal-Democratic Party won big victories in elections to both houses of the Diet in the summer of that year and thus gained a stable majority. Hence, in the past 2 years, there has been a resurgence of the party's activities for revising the constitution, and it has also launched an all-round fierce attack on the question of textbook screening.

On 22 July 1980 the Liberal-Democratic Cabinet's Justice Minister Okuno spoke at a Cabinet meeting criticizing the "lack of cultivation of the patriotic spirit." On 15 October that same year Education Minister Tanaka made a similar speech to the Education Committee of the House of Representatives. On 29 October the Liberal-Democratic Party set up five small internal committees, including a committee on the school textbook issue.

Action guidelines adopted on 23 January 1981 by the Liberal-Democratic Party congress took as one of the guidelines the "'impeachment' of leftwing-inclined education." On 27 February a group of scholars of Tsukuba University, supporters of the Liberal-Democratic Party, published "Highly Dubious Junior Secondary School Textbooks" to create a momentum for encircling and attacking textbooks. A meeting of leaders of the Liberal-Democratic Party on 3 March decided to launch a "textbook campaign." On 9 March Liberal-Democratic Party Diet member Tamachi made a speech attacking school textbooks in the upper house Budget Committee. On 27 April the textbook association demanded that the Education Ministry carry out an all-round revision of "citizens'" school textbooks. On 6 May the Liberal-Democratic Party's Education Department and the education system investigation committee held a joint meeting which decided on formulating a school textbook law and other measures. On 24 November the education minister's consultative organ, the 13th central education review committee, held its first plenary session, which advocated greater regional centralization in jurisdiction over the selection and use of school textbooks, so as to strengthen control over the textbooks. Regarding this, the Education Ministry authorities said: "It is essential to amend the law" in order to carry out this plan.

It is evident from the host of facts cited above that the issue of Japanese school textbooks is actually a question of what ideology to apply in educating posterity and of what road Japan is going to follow in the future. At the same time, it is also a question related to whether Japan can in fact live in mutual understanding with the Asia-Pacific region and establish enduring relations of friendship and cooperation with it. The emergence of the school textbook issue will make people outside Japan more alert and realize more fully the necessity of having a more all-round and profound understanding of Japan.

Japanese Editorial Noted

OW231330 Beijing XINHUA in English 1233 GMT 23 Aug 82

[Text] Tokyo, August 23 (XINHUA) — NIHON KEIZAI SHIMBUN today editorially demanded that the Japanese Government should state explicitly Japan's past wars against its Asian neighbours were aggressive wars and say clearly when and how it will correct those parts of the textbooks distorted by the Education Ministry.

The editorial said because the Education Ministry distorted history when censoring textbooks, Japan's prestige in the world has suffered an unprecedented loss.

In reviewing Japan's history, the editorial stressed, a clear distinction should be made between right and wrong and between good and evil. It is also necessary to state definitely what should be negated and show the intent to prevent recurrence of past crimes. The editorial demanded that Zenko Suzuki make "a historic decision" as a step toward the restoration of Japan's international confidence.

NODONG SINMUN Commentary Cited

[Text] Pyongyang, August 22 (XINHUA) -- The Japanese authorities attempt to distort the facts of Japanese aggression is an intolerable insult to history, says a commentary carried by NODONG SINMUN today.

The commentary says that the crimes perpetrated by the Japanese imperialists in Korea and other areas in Asia are historical facts which nobody can deny. They are clearly recorded in the minutes of the trials of war criminals at the international courts, the minutes of Japanese Cabinet meeting and conferences before the throne, documents of the German Foreign Ministry, and confessions of war criminals.

The textbook revision has been condemned by indignant public opinion both in Japan and other countries because the Japanese authorities, by glossing over the facts of Japanese aggression, attempted to militarize the country and carry out expansion abroad, the commentary pointed out.

If the Japanese reaction schemes to renew its old fond dream of "Greater East Asia Co-prosperity Sphere" and embarks again onto the road of aggression and war against the Asian people, they are doomed to meet the same tragic fate of their ancestors, the commentary warns.

SRV SAID TO LAUNCH NEW OFFENSIVE IN KAMPUCHEA

OW240201 Beijing XINHUA in English 1201 GMT 23 Aug 82

[Text] Bangkok, August 23 (XINHUA) -- Vietnamese occupation troops in Kampuchea have renewed military offensives against the Kampuchean resistance forces in the areas opposite the Thai border province of Prachin Buri, according to reports from the Thai eastern border areas. The offensives followed the recent Vietnamese movement of heavy weapons and rotation of troops. A Western diplomat here disclosed that the so-called "partial withdrawal" had never happened. On the contrary, new reinforcements had been moved into western Kampuchea, he added.

A senior Thai military officer said yesterday that the Vietnamese recently fortified their bases near the Kampuchea-Thai border to facilitate the use of military hardware in their attacks. But they would not be able to use their tanks on the border areas as the soil there was soft enough to get the tanks bogged down.

Today's NATION REVIEW quoted Assistant Commander-in-Chief of the Thai Army Gen. Arthit Kamlang-ek as saying that fighting between rival forces in western Kampuchea had escalated and resulted in spillovers across the border into Thailand. Artillery and mortar shells fired from the Vietnamese troops landed on Thai soil and caused damage to the property of Thai villagers along the border.

THAI OFFICER SAYS MORE USSR WEAPONS IN KAMPUCHEA

OW210918 Beijing XINHUA in English 0744 GMT 21 Aug 82

[Text] Bangkok, August 21 (XINHUA) -- A senior Thai intelligence officer disclosed yesterday that the Soviet Union has recently sent more than 100 T-54 and T-58 medium tanks and some long-range 155-mm artillery pieces to Kampuchea to bolster the strength of Vietnamese occupation forces, reported the BANGKOK POST today.

The officer, Assistant Director-General of the Central Intelligence Department of Thailand Thanu Chalarak, made the statement during a panel discussion at the Central Security Command.

He also said that about 80,000 fresh Vietnamese troops had been posted along the Kampuchean-Thai border. These troops, stationed from the areas opposite the Thai province of Ubon Ratchathani in the northeast down to the areas opposite the eastern province, were capable of attacking Thailand at any time, he said.

Thanu said that following the Soviet delivery of tanks and long-range cannons, Hanoi had launched a new offensive on August 11, aimed at annihilating the Kampuchean resistance forces.

He said that in the past six months Hanoi had committed about 10,000 troops in an offensive against the resistance forces. But the blitz was a fiasco and had resulted in about 3,000 Vietnamese troops being killed or wounded. However, the Kampuchen resistance forces had suffered about 1,000 casualties during the period.

In the past three years, the Soviet Union had poured aid worth about 1,000 million U.S. dollars into Kampuchea via Vietnam while assistance from international agencies totaled about 860 million U.S. dollars.

AFP: HU YAOBANG ON SINO-FRENCH COOPERATION

OW231548 Hong Kong AFP in English 1534 GMT 23 Aug 82

[Text] Beijing, Aug. 23 (AFP) -- China is ready to buy Mirage jets from France and to establish joint production of the aircraft, Communist Party Chairman Hu Yaobang told AGENCE FRANCE-PRESSE President and Director-General Henri Pigeat here today. In an exclusive 2-hour interview, Mr Hu referred to other areas of possible cooperation with France, listing nuclear power stations, oil, and coal.

The agreement for purchase and co-production of French Dauphin helicopters was operating well, he said.

When French External Relations Minister Claude Cheysson visited Beijing 3 weeks ago he said that France was prepared to supply China with "defence weapons," but refused to elaborate.

Dauphin helicopters are currently being produced in China. There is an assembly line in Manchuria and engines are built in Hunan in central China.

The Mirage fighter-bomber is manufactured by France's Societe Marcel Dassault, which was nationalised after the Socialist victory in France last year.

RENMIN RIBAO ON PIPELINE SANCTIONS DISPUTE

HK231239 Beijing RENMIN RIBAO in Chinese 18 Aug 82 p 7

[Article by Zhang Yunwen [1728 0336 2429]: "Since the United States Extended Sanctions -- New Development in the Western Controversy Over the Natural Gas Pipeline Project"]

[Text] The 18 June announcement of President Reagan's decision to extend sanctions on the sale of oil and natural gas equipment to the Soviet Union has been evoking strong repercussions in Western Europe. There have been fierce U.S.-European squabbles over this issue. The contradiction between them is still developing.

West Europeans unanimously expressed shock and indignation at the fact that the U.S. administration took this action, which infringes upon their major interests, without holding prior consultations with them. Member states of the EEC have held many meetings to protest the U.S. decision. On 11 August 10 member states of the EEC unanimously adopted a "strongly worded" note to the U.S. administration. The note charged that the U.S. ban was a "violation of international law" and was an "unacceptable interference in the internal affairs of the EEC." The note called on the United States to withdraw its embargo. Such a united action taken by the EEC countries and such an uncompromising stand adopted by the EEC against the U.S. sanctions are rarely seen.

The U.S. allies in Western Europe have tried in every possible way to oppose the ban, such as standing up against the ban and softly pressuring the United States. They have done their utmost to force the Reagan administration to reverse its decision. As a country which has all along adopted an independent attitude, France has publicly contradicted the United States. French President Mitterrand charged that the U.S. sanctions were "repressive, unjust and dangerous," were "thoroughgoing pretension and protectionism" and that the sanctions seriously disrupted the "unity" achieved at the Versailles summit. While the gas pipeline issue was creating discord on the two sides of the Atlantic Ocean, the Reagan administration approved an extension of grain sales to the Soviet Union. This kind of self-contradictory policy has infuriated France. French Minister of Agriculture Edith Cresson sarcastically said: "One may steal a horse while another may not look over the hedge. This may be Reagan's maxim." French Foreign Minister Claude Cheysson said France planned to ignore the U.S. demand.

On 22 July the French Government formally announced its decision to ignore the U.S. demand so as to allow French companies to continue participating in the Soviet gas pipeline construction project. The French media noted: France has taken the "road of direct confrontation" with the United States.

As the U.S. "key principal ally," West Germany has taken a great share in the building of the gas pipeline. In fact, the West German attitude shows that it sides with France. However, West Germany's approach is relatively mild. Generally speaking, the way it made known its position was not as uncompromising as the French. West Germany has constantly sent its economic minister to the United States to hold talks with the U.S. side. West German Chancellor Helmut Schmidt paid a private visit to the United States in the name of vacationing. During his visit, Schmidt held talks with President Reagan and U.S. officials, asking the United States to "restrain itself" as far as possible, and he explained to the U.S. side the West German difficulties in canceling the gas pipeline deal. West Germany energetically claimed that U.S.-European contradiction was just a "family quarrel" and strove to achieve a change in the U.S. views and persuade the United States to lift the ban through these internal consultations. Of course, with regard to this issue touching major interests, although West Germany said it did not plan to follow the French practice, it still issued an export license to the country's General Electric Company and actually supported the West German company in ignoring the U.S. ban. On 28 July, Schmidt stressed that Western countries "are unanimously opposed" to the embargo and that nothing can stop this project.

What has far exceeded all expectations is that Britain and Italy, which have traditionally maintained closest ties with the United States as allies, have adopted an antagonistic stand against the United States this time. During her talks with Reagan on 23 June, British Prime Minister Thatcher complained that the U.S. decision would harm the interests of Britain. After this, British Foreign Secretary Francis Pym went to the United States to hold talks with the U.S. side. During his visit, he said that he hoped the "very serious" divergence of views could be settled. Due to the U.S. refusal to change its attitude, British Secretary of State for Trade, Lord Cockfield publicly announced on 2 August: Since the United States has made no response to our wish to find an acceptable method, the British Government has ordered all British companies to defy the U.S. sanctions. This decision by the British Government has publicly shown an antagonistic relationship between the two most closely related allies. The Italian prime minister charged that the U.S. decision has "created splits" within Western countries. Italian Foreign Minister Colombo also visited the United States to iron out differences. After this, the Italian Foreign Ministry announced on 24 July that the Italian Government will honor the contracts signed with the Soviet Union.

The public confrontation between Western European countries and the United States over the natural gas pipeline project has shrouded the two sides of the Atlantic Ocean with a tense atmosphere. Some Western newspapers have regarded the current conflict between the United States and Western Europe as the most serious one since the founding of NATO and also as a "new stage of crisis." U.S. domestic media are also worried that if both parties continue to refuse to budge, rifts that cannot be reversed would emerge within the U.S.-European alliance. Some people have admitted that the U.S. sanctions against the Soviet Union can inflict very small punishment on the Soviets but can do great damage to the Atlantic Alliance. Many people hope that Reagan will adopt measures to alleviate the crisis. However, up to now, the U.S. administration has not softened its position. President Reagan said he had no plans to change the decision. Some American officials threatened to "penalize" those companies which have violated the ban, and also threatened to "enforce the law."

However, many newspapers have noted that such penalties will not be very effective. At the same time, the views of the U.S. ruling group on this issue have become more and more divergent. A subcommittee of the U.S. House of Representatives recently adopted a motion calling for the lifting of the embargo. On 9 August, House Majority Leader Foley [as published] said that President Reagan's ban on the pipeline project was "a disaster in U.S. foreign policy." In the face of these domestic and international situations, President Reagan ordered the establishment of a high-level research group to study ways to settle this dispute.

The U.S.-European squabbles have started at a time when there has been a widespread recession in the economies of the Western capitalist countries; when the economies have not yet taken a favorable turn; when there have been conflicts of interests between Western countries; and when a series of trade wars regarding high interest rates, steel and farm produce have been constantly breaking out between Western countries. Under this kind of situation, the Western European countries' tendency toward independence has become stronger and stronger. Western European countries have accused the U.S. administration of violating its recently reiterated principle that "all allied countries are equal and no one should try to control others." This kind of situation had further complicated U.S.-European contradictions.

At present, in addition to announcing their decisions to ignore the U.S. sanctions, Western European countries are currently carrying out legal procedures to counter U.S. "penalties." France has announced that subsidiaries of foreign companies in France and French companies that have bought patent rights should first abide by the French law prior to giving consideration to abiding by foreign laws. On 2 August the British trade secretary announced the government's decision to cite the 1980 Act for the Protection of the Interests of Trade to prevent British companies from having to comply with foreign laws. However, the U.S. administration has stressed that European countries must abide by the U.S. export act as the contracts they signed require them to do so. Therefore, the INTERNATIONAL HERALD TRIBUNE has predicted: The U.S.-European dispute over the natural gas pipeline project will be turned into a "legal war." The paper said the conflict would not quiet down prior to 21 August, the date the extended United States sanctions go into effect. However, people in some Western countries have noted: Due to the fact that the United States and Western Europe share the same strategic objectives, are interdependent, and are "in the same boat" after all, neither side wants to "see splits within the West" and both sides will do their best to limit the quarrels within the "family" so as to give the Soviet Union no opportunity.

HUNGARY'S VOCATIONAL EDUCATION DESCRIBED

[Article by Ji Ping [7871 1627] "They've Learned the Ropes Well — Impressions of a Visit to Hungary (3)"]

[Text] During my short visit to Hungary I made many friends, some workers, some peasants, some factory managers and directors, other journalists and trade union cadres. I was deeply impressed by how they had all thoroughly learned the ropes of their trade. For example, the director of the Budapest woolen mill had previously worked as workshop foreman, and after a training period had become an expert in business management for the mill. The secretary of the party committee in the mill had previously been the trade union secretary and had studied at a political college. During my visit to the famous Red Star Agricultural Production Cooperative, I learned that 178 members of the cooperative were university graduates and they now formed the backbone of the Red Star Cooperative's move to modernize the rural economy. The leaders of the cooperative all possessed specialized knowledge and technical know-how in the areas of agriculture and animal husbandry. Indeed, many of them were agricultural college graduates.

Many cadres in Hungary do not feel satisfied with the extent of their knowledge and the level of their college degrees and therefore assidiously continue their studies. I remember one young man, who accompanied me on my visits and who was a university graduate in economics. However, he was very interested in journalism and he therefore studied journalism. Another journalist told me that her husband was a mechanical engineer, but he was now working hard studying civil engineering. When I was visiting the famous ancient city of Sopron I met a 29-year-old woman who had one child and worked in a hotel. She worked hard during the day at her job — managing numerous domestic chores -- and in the evening she attended night school.

All the cadres I met in Hungary were able to answer all my questions and discuss all topics I chose to bring up, without any hesitation or awkwardness. An example was the cheif engineer of the Budapest printing works. During talks with me he not only displayed a thorough knowledge of production, management and other areas involved in the works, but in addition showed a complete understanding and grasp of the questions I posed such as the problems of coordinating scientific management and democratic management. He went on to underline the importance of improving business management, the role of trade unions and the establishment of good interpersonal relations.

The section chief of the economics department of the (La Bao) [2139 7637] car factory not only gave me a detailed explanation of the factory's production and management but also discussed the work of the factory's trade union. I asked him why he had such an intimate knowledge of trade union activities and he replied that at one time, when he had to draw up a report concerning factory production and various other things, it was vital that he understand and consider the views and opinions of the trade union. Thus, he had made a careful examination of trade union activities.

How is it that the cadres in Hungary all display this common trait of understanding their jobs inside out? According to my Hungarian friends, the last few years have seen great emphasis placed on the necessity of training and educating cadres. In implementing adjustments in the economic system and increasing business autonomy in decisionmaking, the responsibilities of the cadres at every level become greater, thus putting greater demands on the cadres, which in turn spur them on to study and learn more.

Apart from taking careful note of their political stance and their grasp of political policy, selection procedures for cadres in Hungary also take into account educational reports on individual aptitude, previous duties and vocational and professional training, as well as noting up-to-date knowledge in various fields, practical experience and ability to keep abreast of the continuous developments in science and technology.

For example, the manager of a large enterprise or a factory director is at least expected to be a trained engineer, while the chairman of an agricultural cooperative is expected to have studied agronomy or be an expert in animal husbandry. In addition, factory leaders must possess degree certificates or diplomas proving their qualifications in business management. All the leading cadres in the Budapest printing works had university degrees and of the leaders of the various sections of the works, 40 were certified engineers.

Another fact that struck me was that very few cadres in factories and mass organizations in Hungary give up their normal work duties when they become cadres. For example, of the 20,000 employees at the (La Bao) car factory, only 8 cadres have totally given up work in the factory. And of the 300 trade union committee members at the Budapest woolen mill, only the trade union secretary has given up production work in order to carry out secretarial duties. Such a situation not only enhances relations between workers and the trade union cadres, it also prevents an increase in bureaucracy and spurs cadres in every level of an organization to expand their knowledge and become multitalented people.

In order to improve the task of training cadres, the Hungarian Government uses different strategies. For example, during the early 1970's the government established the "cadre training center," designed to train mid-level leaders and cadres for work in all regions, districts, large enterprises, cooperatives and other bodies. Most cadres and leaders of large enterprises, and those recently promoted to mid-level positions, take the advanced study courses offered in business management and similar studies. Within a year, most of them have written their theses on either improvements in leadership or business management and have sat for the oral defense of their theses. The "training center" also offers a training course mainly designed for those in large enterprises about to be promoted to high-level leadership and cadre posts. This course lasts for 1 year and those taking the course must have university transcripts and international work experience. To graduate, those taking the course must pass an examination and defend their theses. Successful candidates then receive their diplomas. Those who do not meet the standards demanded of cadres, on either a vocational level or for professional reasons, must either temporarily stop work to take additional classes or study by means of correspondence courses or evening school, in order to complete their training requirements. The enormous amount of work necessary in the training of business management grassroots cadres is also given due attention by the Hungarian Government. Enormous numbers of cadres who work at levels above that of workshop head attend business schools where they attend classes in business management for 2 to 4 weeks.

As the power of the trade unions continuously increases, so too do the demands placed on the trade union cadres. Thus, the trade union groups, as well as some industrial trade unions, have set up training courses for trade union cadres, which the cadres at all levels of the trade unions must attend for specified periods, thereby continuing to improve their vocational knowledge and work capacity.

[Text] Warsaw, August 20 (XINHUA) -- The Politburo of the Polish United Workers Party held a meeting today to discuss the present socio-political situation in the country, which called on the party members to take active actions to "safeguard a normal social atmosphere." The meeting pointed out that "forces interested in the destabilization" of Poland intended to stir up "a wave of unrest at the end of August and early in September," to which the authorities "cannot and will not remain indifferent."

Since mid-August, underground Solidarity groups have organized one street demonstration after another in Szczecin, Warsaw, Gdansk, Wroclaw, Krakow and other cities. The "provisional national coordinating committee" of Solidarity issued an appeal recently, calling on the workers to stage massive demonstrations and other activities on August 31 to protest against the state of siege to mark the second anniversary of the summer industrial unrest in 1980.

The Politburo meeting pointed out today that an end to martial law depends closely on "calm and order throughout the country" and the reformation of social, political and economic life.

Another report said that Gen. Wojciech Jaruzelski, chairman of the Military Council of National salvation, on August 18 ordered special sessions of provincial defense councils to be convened to consider "what means should be applied to assure public order."

SHULTZ, WEINBERGER INTERVIEWED ON MIDEAST

OW230740 Beijing XINHUA in English 0701 GMT 23 Aug 82

[Text] Washington, August 22 (XINHUA) -- U.S. Secretary of State George Shultz said today that the U.N. Resolution 242 implies that Israel must withdraw from the West Bank and the Gaza area it occupied. The secretary, interviewed in a T.V. program, said: "I think 242 has that implication in it."

He added that the resolution could be interpreted in many ways but "certainly one of those ways is that some shift in what are the practical borders now will take place."

Asked about the U.S. stand on Palestinian self-determination, Shultz said that the Palestinians "should have a part in determining the conditions under which they are governed."

"I do think the establishment of a situation where the Palestinian people can have some sense of dignity and control of their lives is very important and an essential part of any agreement," he stressed.

Shultz said that he believed that more countries should participate in the Middle East peace process. "Obviously for there to be a genuine peaceful outcome that is widely acceptable in the region there have to be more countries involved than Egypt, Israel and the United States," he noted.

Shultz indicated that despite Israel's invasion of Lebanon it still was a trusted ally of the U.S. The U.S. must be "careful" about Israel's security, he said.

In a separate T.V. interview, Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger also said that the Palestinian people "certainly have to have some kind of a understanding that they, too, are entitled to some of these normal attributes" in a Middle East settlement.

On the peace prospect after the Lebanon crisis, the defense secretary said: "There are a lot of ideas being discussed and being considered, and the American plan, I believe, is in the process of being formulated." But he gave no details except saying that he hoped the plans being considered would lead to "a kind of condition that can enable that very vital region of the world that has been in turmoil for so long to live in peace".

Although he acknowledged that Israel violated an agreement concerning the use of armaments provided by the U.S. in the invasion of Lebanon, Weinberger indicated that there would be no sanctions against the Israelis on this matter.

After a closeup shot of Peng Zhen announcing the meeting open, the camera cuts to session participants raising their hands several times while the announcer enumerates the resolutions, appointments and dismissals approved by the meeting. The filmed report closes with a shot of Foreign Minister Huang Hua shown delivering a report on the negotiations which led to the recent Sino-U.S. communique.

1981 Final State Accounts

[Report on the final state accounts for 1981 delivered by Wang Bingqian, minister of finance, at the 24th Session of the 5th NPC Standing Committee in Beijing on 19 August 1982]

[Text] Beijing, 23 Aug (XINHUA) -- Standing Committee members: At the 23d Session of the 5th NPC Standing Committee held in April of this year, we reported to you the preliminarily gathered figures on the final state accounts for 1981. At that meeting, we suggested to the Standing Committee that the final state accounts would be submitted to you for your examination and approval when they were officially compiled. Now the final state accounts for 1981 have been officially compiled. I have been entrusted by the State Council with making the report on the final state accounts for 1981, which I now submit for your examination.

1981 was a year in which China made important progress in its national economic readjustment. It was also the year in which we achieved a basic balance between revenues and expenditures after successive years with fairly large financial deficits. In 1981 all regions and departments, working under the leadership of the CPC Central Committee and the State Council, seriously implemented the principle of making further economic readjustments and achieving further political stability. At the same time, they adopted a series of effective measures for readjustment and reforms in the financial and economic work. As a result of intense efforts made by the people of the whole country in 1981, new advances were made in production, construction and other undertakings. The deficit between state revenues and expenditures was narrowed down to 2.5 billion yuan in 1981 from a deficit of 12.7 billion yuan in 1980, this achieving a basic balance of revenue and expenditures and creating a good beginning for China's finance and economy to take a fundamental turn for the better.

According to the officially compiled final state accounts, state revenues in 1981 totaled 108.946 billion yuan, or 103.1 percent of the estimated amount. State expenditures totaled 111.497 billion yuan, or 105.5 percent of the previously estimated amount. Expenditures exceeded revenues by 2.551 billion yuan. Comparing these figures with the preliminary figures presented to the 23d session of this standing committee, the total revenues have increased by 2.516 billion yuan and the total expenditures by 2.527 billion yuan while the deficit basically remains unchanged.

Of the total 1981 revenues, domestic revenues amounted to 101.638 billion yuan, or 104.1 percent of the estimated amount; and income from foreign loans amounted to 7.308 billion yuan, or 91.4 percent of the estimated amount. Of the domestic revenues, those from industrial enterprises totaled 35.368 billion yuan, or 94.7 of the estimated amount; and taxes totaled 62.989 billion yuan, or 108.5 percent of the estimated amount. The overfulfillment of various tax collection plans was primarily due to the increase in tax revenues from consumer goods, the production of which increased quite rapidly in 1981. Moreover, the government improved the management of tax revenues and collected additional revenues by investigating tax evasions and collecting overdue taxes. The revenues from industrial enterprises were below the estimated figures, primarily because the government arranged an additional number of jobs for unemployed youth and thus increased the wage expenditures of industrial enterprises. The increased state subsidies to offset price increases of farm and sideline products also correspondingly reduced some revenues.

Of the total expenditures in 1981, domestic outlays amounted to 104.189 billion yuan, or 106.7 percent of the estimate, and capital construction appropriations drawing on foreign loans amounted to 7.308 billion yuan, or 91.4 percent of the estimate. Of the above-mentioned domestic outlays, appropriations for capital construction amounted to 25.755 billion yuan, or 105.9 percent of the estimate; funds for tapping the potential of existing enterprises and for financing their technical transformation and the trial manufacture of new products totaled 6.53 billion yuan, or 129.8 percent of the estimate; additional allocations of circulating funds totaled 2.284 billion yuan, or 95.2 percent of the estimate; financial aid to people's communes and other agricultural undertakings amounted to 7.368 billion yuan, or 99.4 percent of the estimate; funds for culture, education, public health work and science totaled 17.136 billion yuan, or 107.4 percent of the estimate; expenditures on national defense and preparations against war amounted to 16.797 billion yuan, or 100.8 percent of the estimate; and administrative expenses amounted to 7.088 billion yuan, or 118.7 percent of the estimate.

The 1981 financial estimates have been implemented well, basically achieving a balance between revenues and expenditures. This is a result of the tremendous efforts made by the people of all nationalities throughout the country. During the year, our state finances adopted a number of important measures in coordination with the economic readjustment and reforms. With the concerted efforts by the various areas and departments, marked results were achieved.

First, based on the principle of doing things according to our capabilities, expenditures were cut. Total investment in capital construction for 1981 amounted to 42.8 billion yuan, 11.1 billion yuan less than the 53.9 billion yuan of last year. Investments appropriated directly out of state revenues accounted for 8.8 billion yuan of this reduction. In the course of curtailing the scale of capital construction, the state has suspended projects which lack the necessary conditions for construction or for production after completion, and suspended or postponed overlapping projects which would compete with existing enterprises for raw materials, fuel and power. Funds and materials were thus released for transfer to key projects and projects which can meet urgent production needs. These measures have speeded up those projects and helped balance revenues and expenditures. Besides capital construction investment, expenditures on national defense and preparations against war were also reduced to 16.797 billion yuan, 2.587 billion yuan less than the 19.384 billion yuan of last year. During the year, the PLA, while vigorously strengthening its modernization and regularization programs, put the overall interest first, cut down expenses, shared the difficulties of the state and contributed greatly to balancing revenues and expenditures. Reviewing the financial revenues and expenditures in 1981, it can be seen very clearly that seeking truth from facts and doing things within our capabilities is our principle for handling economic problems. It is a positive principle, and an important principle which must be adhered to under the circumstances of national financial difficulties.

Secondly, we have vigorously developed agriculture and light industry and expanded the production of consumer goods so as to increase revenues. Agriculture is the foundation of the national economy, and consumer goods production provides the basic condition for satisfying the people's daily needs. Agricultural development and expanded consumer goods production not only are conducive to readjusting the economic structure and harmonizing the proportional relations among various sectors, but help ensure market stability and increased revenues. As a result of carrying out the policies for the rural economy formulated by the party and government and of introducing various forms of production responsibility system, plus the fact that the state increased the purchasing prices of agricultural and sideline products, thus increasing the peasants' income, production enthusiasm has been greatly increased among the peasant masses, and the agricultural production situation is getting better and better.

The rural areas now present a thriving scene seldom known for many years. In 1981, despite serious natural disasters, the country's total agricultural output value still increased by 5.7 percent over the previous year. To develop light industry and textile industry production, the state has given it first priority with regard to raw and semifinished materials, power, transport and funds. The output value of the light and textile industry increased by 14.1 percent over the previous year. Therefore, even though heavy industry output dropped temporarily during the year in the course of economic readjustment, owing to the rapid growth of light industry and the textile industry the country's total industrial output value still showed an increase of 4.1 percent over the previous year. In 1981, the sharp growth in the output of goods for everyday consumption not only enlivened the market, brought about economic prosperity and ensured that the everyday needs of the people in town and country were met, but also substantially contributed to reabsorbing currency and to balancing revenues and expenditures. The retail commodity price index in domestic markets increased by 2.4 percent, as compared to 6 percent the previous year.

Thirdly, while cutting other expenditures, the state appropriately increased allocations for culture, education, science and public health work, continued to provide jobs for urban youth awaiting employment and readjusted wages for some of the workers and staff members. As a result, the living standards of people in urban and rural areas continued to improve somewhat. Expenditures on culture, education, public health work and science increased from 15,626 billion yuan in 1980 to 17.136 billion yuan in 1981, an increase of 1.51 billion yuan or 9.7 percent. Operating expenses for education, public health work and science increased by 8.8 percent, 10.1 percent and 23.7 percent respectively, both exceeding the increase in industrial and agricultural production. During the year, the state continued to provide many forms of jobs for urban youth and other people. Adding the university and secondary vocational school graduates' assigned jobs under unified state plans this year, a total of 8.2 million people were assigned jobs. New houses with a total floor surface of more than 97 million square meters were completed in cities and towns, a 5.5 percent increase over the previous year. To solve step by step the wage problem of those working in government offices and scientific, cultural, educational and public health departments where no bonus system is practiced, the wages for middle and primary school teachers, physical culture workers and a section of the medical personnel were increased in the 4th quarter of 1981. Also, it should be mentioned that in the past few years, while raising the purchase prices for agricultural and sideline products, the state in order to stabilize market prices, has all along adopted the method of subsidizing prices for basic necessities that have a direct bearing on the people's life. In 1981, state expenditures for various types of price subsidies amounted to more than 32 billion yuan. Price subsidies for grain, cotton and edible oil and the additional prices paid for above-quota purchases of these commodities, which come directly out of state coffers, totalled 16,309 billion yuan, an increase of 4,351 billion yuan over the previous year. The increased subsidies and expenditures also directly or indirectly benefitted the people in town and countryside.

Fourthly, we have consolidated financial management, strengthened financial supervision and plugged loopholes in various areas. In 1981, the state adopted certain measures to check the various forms of tax evasion and prevent and correct actions violating law and discipline. At the beginning of the year, the State Council issued the "Decision on Balancing Revenues and Expenditures and Enforcing Strict Financial Management." In May, it approved and published the "Circular on Checking Up on Tax Frauds, Evasions and Delinquencies." Later on, it organized numerous financial inspections of enterprises. Under the leadership of party committees and governments at various levels, and through the efforts made during the year, the state of loose financial management and supervision has been rectified to a certain degree. A part of the revenues have been investigated and recovered, and some expenses have been saved. According to reports and statistics from various places, tax payments that were checked and recovered and overdue enterprises profits turned over to the state in 1981 totalled 1.8 billion yuan.

This not only helped straighten out financial and economic discipline and contributed to bringing about a basic balance between revenues and expenditure, but it had a positive bearing on correcting certain unhealthy trends and dealing blows to criminal activities in the economic field.

In one short year of 1981, the state resolutely cut the rather huge deficit, marking a turning point in the state's financial conditions. This is inseparable from the various areas and departments putting the overall interest above everything else, working in concert and shouldering difficulties. During the year, in order to suitably collect the idle capital in society, it was planned to issue 4 to 5 billion yuan in treasury bonds. With the vigorous support from all quarters, 4,866 billion yuan were actually collected. The income from the treasury bonds has, in accordance with the originally determined purpose, been used to make up the 1980 deficits, but it also played a positive role in achieving a basic balance between credit receipts and payments and in controlling the amount of currency in circulation in 1981.

The result of the implementation of the 1981 financial estimates shows: Under the situation of considerable financial difficulties and large scale national economic readjustment, in 1981 a basic balance was achieved between revenues and expenditures, industrial and agriculture production maintained a certain growth rate, market prices remained basically stable, and the people's living standards in urban and rural areas were further improved somewhat. This was not easy. We must consolidate this achievement and further develop and expand the achievement already made in the days to come.

Of course, we must also realize that the basic balance between revenues and expenditures in 1981 was achieved mainly by large cuts in expenditures, and therefore was not solid. The potential dangers in the national economy, though eased, are not yet eradicated. In some localities, departments and units, the situation of serious losses and waste and poor economic returns has not changed much. Owing to loose financial management, there still are quite a number of loopholes. Illegal and criminal economic activities and serious violations of financial and economic discipline have yet to be seriously investigated and handled in some units. This shows that to maintain a basic balance between revenues and expenditures, we still have to do a lot of work from now on and should continue to persist in enhancing our socialist cultural level while promoting our material development. In short, we must continue to solve the existing problems, develop the excellent situation and must not lower our guard.

More than 7 months have passed in 1982. Judging by the implementation of the state budget from January through July, the country's financial and economic situation is continuing to turn for the better. However, there still are problems: Mainly, expenditures which are increasing rather suddenly. In order to continue to maintain a basic balance between revenues and expenditures, the State Council has notified the various areas and departments that they must pay close attention to economic and financial work in the next few months, further developing activities to increase production and practicing economy, focusing on increasing economic results; earnestly perfect ways to acquire, accumulate and use funds; vigorously organize income; strictly control and cut down expenditures; strengthen financial inspection and supervision; resolutely oppose extravagance and waste; and deal blows at criminal activities in the economic field. We believe that although we are still faced with many difficulties, so long as all trades and occupations will conscientiously implement the State Council's various work plans, heighten their spirits, seek truth from facts, unite as one, and pay close attention to work, this year's national budget surely can be successfully followed.

HU YAOBANG MEETS AFP DIRECTOR, REVIEWS POLICIES

OW231700 Beijing XINHUA in English 1502 GMT 23 Aug 82

[Text] Beijing, August 23 (XINHUA) -- Hu Yaobang, chairman of the Central Committee of the Chinese Communist Party, said here this afternoon that China's political situation will remain stable for a long time.

"The political situation of our country will surely remain stable for a comparatively long time," he said at a meeting with an AFP delegation headed by its director-general, Henri Pigeat.

Hu Yaobang said that since the third plenary session of the 11th party Central Committee held in December 1978, the practice has proved that this view has grounds.

He said: "First, the absolute majority of the Chinese people have accepted the necessary lesson from a time of turmoil in the past; and second, our party that leads the country has restored the principle of democratic centralism and realized the principle of collective leadership in the central leading body. The solid organizational system that has been established guarantees that our political situation will continue to be stable for a long time."

On China's economy, Chairman Hu noted that fundamental changes have taken place in the economy of New China in comparison with old China and great changes have happened in the economy in about four years after the third plenary session of the 11th party Central Committee against that in the 12 years before the session.

But, he said, the economy now is still lagging way behind the economically-developed countries. "It will require decades of efforts for our country to enter the ranks of the economically-developed countries," the chairman said.

Chairman Hu said: "We have confidence in building China into a comparatively well-off country before the end of this century. Our plan is to lay a solid foundation before 1990 and the tempo for economic development during the last 10 years of the century will be quicker."

"To obtain the goal," Chairman Hu said, "we should develop agriculture and animal husbandry, train competent personnel and undertake some key construction projects -- mainly energy, transport and communications items. We will continue to follow a policy of opening to the outside world on the basis of equality and mutual benefit."

Hu Yaobang said that China's foreign policy is to maintain independence and keep the initiative in China's hands. "The two basic principles of our foreign policy are: first, to develop friendly relations with all countries in the world, particularly to strengthen unity and cooperation with the Third World countries, on the basis of the five principles of peaceful coexistence; and second, to oppose hegemonism and safeguard world peace. These two principles cannot be separated and are the basic principles of our country," he said.

He said that China is a Third World country and will never seek hegemonism. "China firmly believes in this principle of Marxism, that is, the nation that oppresses another nation does not enjoy freedom," he added.

On Sino-French relations, Hu Yaobang said that the political relations between the two countries are very good. The two sides should make efforts to promote economic and technical cooperation and make the economic relations of the two countries correspond with their political relations.

Hu Yaobang asked Pigeat to convey his best wishes to President Mitterrand and extended an invitation for him to visit China.

Present on the occasion were: Mu Qing, director-general of the XINHUA NEWS AGENCY; Zeng Tao, adviser to the agency; and Charles Malo, French ambassador to China.

The French guests arrived in Beijing August 20. The following day, they were honored at a banquet hosted by Zeng Tao in the Great Hall of the People.

AFP REPORTERS ON INTERVIEW WITH HU YAOBANG

Deng To Give Up CPC Job

OW232016 Hong Kong AFP in English 1942 GMT 23 Aug 82

[By Charles-Antoine de Nerciat]

[Text] Beijing, Aug 23 (AFP) -- Chinese Communist Party Chairman Hu Yaobang indicated today that the upcoming party congress would set up a powerful General Secretariat to be headed by himself and Premier Zhao Ziyang.

Mr Hu also confirmed reports that Deng Xiaoping, the strongman of post-Maoist China, will give up his position as party vice chairman following the congress due to open 1 September.

But the party chief, who made his remarks in a meeting with Henri Pigeat, chairman of AGENCE FRANCE-PRESS, also stressed the stability of the team recruited over the last 2 years by the 78-year-old Mr Deng. He said Mr Deng would continue to play a role in Chinese political life.

Official Chinese sources said that Mr Deng, who bounced back after being sacked twice by Mao Zedong during the 1966-76 Cultural Revolution, would head a new party group, the Committee of Advisers.

Mr Hu said that Mr Deng had taken three steps to remove himself from the frontline of decisionmaking in China and direct input in daily affairs. One was the creation of a party General Secretariat, another was his resignation as party vice chairman and the third was a decision to meet with foreign dignitaries less frequently.

"The work of the General Secretariat is presided over by myself and by Comrade Zhao Ziyang," said Mr Hu, like Premier Zhao a protege of Mr Deng. Mr Zhao is not a member of the current Secretariat, while Mr Hu is its chief while also serving as party chairman. The two men rose to their posts as Mr Deng stripped away over the last 2 years the powers of Hua Guofeng, the man whom Mao Zedong had personally chosen as his successor on the eve of his death in late 1976. Mr Hua gave way to Mr Zhao as head of the government in 1980 and last year lost the chairmanship of the party to Mr Hu, Mr Deng's right hand man.

Mr Hu, officially the top party leader, defined the General Secretariat as a "frontline" body, which would handle all important questions. The Politburo, which wields executive power in the party and is currently composed of 23 members, will be in the "second line," dealing with only those matters which need "a high-level decision."

Vice Premier Wan Li recently indicated to some foreign visitors that the party congress would abolish the posts of party chairman and vice chairmen. There are currently six vice chairmen. In hierarchical order they are: Ye Jianying, Mr Deng, Mr Zhao, Li Xiannian, Chen Yun and Hua Guofeng.

Mr Wan also indicated that Mr Deng would sit on the party's Committee of Advisers, a body for aging Chinese leaders that will be set up with adoption by the congress of a new party constitution.

During his talks with Mr Pigeat, Mr Hu heaped lavish praise on Mr Deng, saying that among the major Chinese leaders he was "the most experienced, the most renowned and the one who makes the largest number of decisions."

Comments on CPC Congress

OW231908 Hong Kong AFP in English 1844 GMT 23 Aug 82

[By Charles Antoine de Nerciat]

[Text] Beijing, Aug 23 (AFP) -- The chairman of the Chinese Communist Party, Hu Yaobang, said today he was virtually certain of a long period of stability in China that should reassure the country's economic partners. "China will know a very stable political situation until the end of the century. I am not 100 per cent sure of it, but at least 90 percent," he told a delegation from AGENCE FRANCE-PRESSE headed by AFP chairman Henri Pigeat.

Mr Hu said that Deng Xiaoping, party vice chairman and the strongman of post-Maoist China, had put himself in the "second line" of the administration, no longer following day-to-day matters and making only major decisions.

During the exclusive 2-hour interview, Mr Hu said that Chinese stability was anchored in two "foundations." One, he said, was the fact that "we have drawn the necessary lessons of history," and the other was the guiding role of the party with the return to "democratic centralism and a system of collegial management."

Mr Hu said that these guiding principles were not respected by Mao Zedong during the Cultural Revolution of 1966-76 or by his immediate successor, Hua Guofeng, party chairman from 1976 to 1978.

Mr Hu had lavish praise for Mr Deng, the most important victim of the Cultural Revolution still around. He said that among the top Chinese leaders, Mr Deng was "the most experienced, the most renowned, and the one who takes the largest number of decisions."

Here are the major points made by Mr Hu in the interview, his first with Western journalists, in the Great Hall of the People, the seat of the national people's assembly or Chinese parliament:

Communist Party Congress

The structure to be set up by the congress scheduled to open 1 September will divide responsibilities between the General Secretariat "in the first line" and the Politburo "in the second line," Mr Hu said. He said he and Premier Zhao Ziyang preside over the Secretariat's work.

Leftist Opposition

Mr Hu said that the influence of the supporters of the Cultural Revolution's leftist regime had been eliminated "for the most part" as only "one or two people in 10,000 perhaps still believe in these ideas."

Economy

Mr Hu estimated that the per capita income in China could reach about $1,000 a year by the end of the century as opposed to the current $300.

He defined two phases for the development of China's economy: "Laying down solid bases" until 1990 and then an acceleration in the growth rate in the following decade.

The Soviet Union

Mr Hu once more emphasized China's determination to "fight hegemonism to safeguard world peace," pointing out that in Beijing's eyes the conditions necessary for a Sino-Soviet normalization have not yet been fulfilled. Recalling that the Soviet Union had made a series of overtures to China, Mr Hu said: "But what really matters is not words but action."

He said that there were three problems regarding the Soviet Union. "The Soviet Union supports Vietnam in its aggression against Kampuchea (Cambodia), is occupying Afghanistan, and has amassed more than a million men on the Chinese border, with bombers and missiles.

"If these three problems are resolved, we are ready to have neighbourly relations," Mr Hu said.

The United States

Mr Hu expressed his satisfaction at the recently concluded Sino-American agreement on U.S. arms sales to Taiwan, describing it as "a good thing".

"But," he added, "there is still a cloud over our relations." He renewed China's condemnation of the "Taiwan Relations Act" defining Washington's non-official relations with Taipei. He repeated that Beijing, which claims sovereignty over the Nationalist-ruled island of Taiwan, sees the act as an interference in China's internal affairs.

France

On the subject of Sino-French relations, Chairman Hu said that China was ready to buy "Mirage" fighters from France and to establish joint production of the plans.

Mr Hu expressed his satisfaction at the warm political relations between France and China, but regretted that economic exchanges were not as developed. "Your technology is among the world's most advanced," he added. "But your prices are a little too high."

Asked about the possibility of France constructing a nuclear power station in Guangdong Province, which borders on Hong Kong, Mr Hu said: "All this must take place under advantageous conditions. It is only in this way that a decision can be taken."

Nuclear Power Program

OW231748 Hong Kong AFP in English 1722 GMT 23 Aug 82

[Text] Beijing, Aug 23 (AFP) -- China's nuclear program provides for the production of more than 10 million kilowatts in 10 to 20 years' time, Chinese Communist Party Chairman Hu Yaobang told AGENCE FRANCE-PRESSE here today.

Besides the power stations that will be built using purely Chinese technology, China, he said, intends to "import stations of several hundred thousand, even 2 million to 3 million kilowatts, but only under favorable conditions."

Mr Hu said that the Chinese technology stations, "which we want to build ourselves," will produce about 300,000 kilowatts.

China announced last week that the first station will be built near Shanghai.

Mr Hu's remarks were seen here as indicating that stations producing more than 1 million kilowatts will be undertaken with foreign technology only if the conditions of financing -- prices and credits -- represent a good bargain for China. The most advanced talks in this area concern a pressurised water reactor in Guangdong Province, near Hong Kong. For the Guangdong station, which should produce about 1.8 million kilowatts, France and the United States are in the running. Part of the cash might come from Hong Kong, which would take a considerable part of the electricity produced.

A French Government mission has just been to Beijing to discuss the problem. It arrived today in Hong Kong to continue contacts. Meanwhile, Hong Kong Governor Sir Edward Youde has just been to Guangzhou, and Guangdong Province Governor Liu Tianfu will be visiting Hong Kong next week.

Mr Hu said the green light for the Chinese nuclear program was not given without arousing "considerable controversy." His statement today was the most precise to date on the major outline of the Chinese nuclear program, observers said.

The controversy stemmed from the fact that some Chinese leaders queried whether nuclear stations were needed in a country that has not exhausted other forms of energy, like coal and hydroelectricity.

Hu Predicts Stability

OW240537 Hong Kong AFP in English 0440 GMT 24 Aug 82

[By Jean Huteau]

[Text] Beijing, Aug 24 (AFP) -- Quick, resolute and lively, Chinese Communist Party Chairman Hu Yaobang chain-smoked "Panda" cigarettes as he spoke with confidence about China and the world.

He talked of "mountains of problems high as Qomolongma" -- which Western maps call Everest. But this 67-year-old veteran of the Long March showed no signs of the heavy strain during an interview yesterday at the Great Hall of the People in the heart of Beijing.

For two hours, the small and perpetually moving Mr Hu painted an impressive fresco of China's prospects for the end of the century and the "Middle Kingdom's" place on the world chessboard.

The interview with Henri Pigeat, chairman of AGENCE FRANCE-PRESSE, and two AFP journalists, was the first time Mr Hu had ever spoken to the Western press as China's leader.

Officially the top leader in China, Mr Hu is above all the right hand man of Deng Xiaoping, party vice chairman and the real power in post-Maoist China. The two have worked together for more than 40 years.

Mr Hu wasted no time in turning the interview into an exposition of the broad outlines of Chinese policy. "Vice Chairman Deng Xiaoping should have met you today, but he asked me to do it in his place. It's one of the steps he has taken to move to the second line," he said.

He came right to the heart of the question of the moment: Where was China going? Was it about to suffer another stormy transition of power with the eclipse -- or withdrawal to the "second line" -- of Mr Deng?

No, insisted Mr Hu, sometimes playfully, sometimes in solemn tones bordering on indignation. On the contrary, he predicted a long period of stability ahead, a period to inspire confidence in China.

A shrewd veteran of Chinese politics, trained at the revolutionary army's school for political commissars and hardened by years of work in the ranks of the Young Communists, Mr Hu sketched his vision of the world with the broad strokes of a great statesman.

He saw historic cycles: 30 years of stability while the party was under collegial management, then a dozen years of instability 1965 to 1978 when Chairman Mao Zedong and his protege Hua Guofeng deviated from the scheme.

But might China someday return to the bloody, turbulent years of the 1966-76 Cultural Revolution? No, insisted Mr Hu, like Mr Deng sacked by Mao during this period of semi-civil war. The influence the leftists have in China today was negligible, he said.

To drive home his points, Mr Hu occasionally rose. He punctuated his sentences with sweeping gestures. With the weather-beaten look of a man of the land, he mixed comments on the development of animal husbandry in a rural area of the Sino-Soviet border he visited with observations on Soviet hegemonism.

Mr Hu was frank about China's development: it was behind schedule. But he quickly added hopes for the country's growth.

Fixing his guests with an intent look, sizing up their reactions and trying to win them over, Mr Hu appeared to be a man in full control, brimming with confidence and sure of his power.

RENMIN RIBAO CALLS FOR STRICT POPULATION CONTROL

HK230830 Beijing RENMIN RIBAO in Chinese 23 Aug 82 pp 1, 2

[Editorial: "Strictly Control Population Growth"]

[Text] Last February the CPC Central Committee and State Council issued instructions on further promoting planned paranthood work, pointing out that the issue of controlling China's population growth is a major strategic question in the country's socialist modernization drive and demanding that the party committees and government at all levels strengthen leadership over planned parenthood. The whole country has seriously implemented these central instructions in the past half year. The party and CYL members, cadres, workers and commune members have enthusiastically responded to the call for "each couple to have only one child," and new achievements have been scored in planned parenthood work.

At present more than 15 million couples have taken out single child certificates, and more than 100 million couples of child-bearing age have spontaneously taken comprehensive contraception measures and have practiced birth control. According to statistics for the first half of the year, 60 percent of babies born were firstborn, 4 percent more than in the same period last year, while the percentage of those who were not firstborn declined. So long as we continue to get a tight grasp of this work in the second half of the year, it is estimated that the country will fulfill the year's population plan. Under the current circumstances of a large increase in the number of newlyweds and nearing a peak in the population, the fact that such outstanding success has been scored in planned parenthood work fully demonstrated the efficacy of the central instructions and expresses the socialist awareness of the people of the country in spontaneously marrying later and having fewer children for the sake of accomplishing the "four modernizations."

Of course, we also see that there are still many problems and difficulties in planned parenthood work. Our country's planned parenthood work is being carried out in a situation where there is a national population of 1 billion, 800 million of whom are peasants. Since the rural areas instituted various types of the production responsibility system, a number of peasants have had a greater desire to have more children in the wake of a better economic life. Several thousand years of tradition and habit have brought about such thinking as "many sons mean much happiness," carrying on the family line, the mentality of regarding men as superior to women, and the currently existing problem of raising children as insurance against old age, are hampering the in-depth development of planned parenthood work. China's base population figure is high, the population is on the young side, and population growth has been rapid. These characteristics determine the urgency for and the long-term and arduous nature of planned parenthood work. According to statistics, 63 percent of the population was born since liberation, and 240 million young couples will have entered marriage and child-bearing age by the end of the century. The population peak starting now will last for more than 10 years; even if population plan demands are met, with the average population growth falling to 13 per 1,000 and the single-child rate rising to 58 percent during the Sixth 5-Year Plan, and with the average population growth falling to 11 per 1,000, the single-child rate increasing to 63 percent and the percentage of babies who are more than second-born falling to below 5 percent during the Seventh 5-Year Plan, there will still be about 19 million births a year before 1990. If there is the slightest relaxation, the population will grow still more. This is bound to hamper the development of the national economy and the improvement of people's standards of living. It will also hamper the development of education and public health and adversely affect the improvement of population quality.

We must be circumspect and far-sighted and soberly perceive the serious population problem facing the country. At present certain comrades still lack sufficient understanding of the urgency of controlling population growth and have failed to effectively grasp the work. A few people are even apathetic about this major national strategy and attach no importance to it. As a result, population growth has gone out of control in some places. We hope that these comrades will bring their thinking into line with the spirit of the central instructions, attach a high degree of importance to the major strategic issue of population control, and get a thoroughly good grasp of this work.

Population control is a basic national strategy and a long-term strategic plan. We must ensure that the accomplishment of the target for population does not exceed 1.2 billion by the end of the century, as stipulated in the "government work report" approved by the 4th Session of the 5th NPC. We must continue to carry out the policy of "restricting population numbers and improving its quality," and persistently advocate late marriages and later, fewer and better quality births. In particular, we must continue to advocate everywhere that "each couple should have only one child." Although some people still do not understand this demand, so long as we do our work well, they will gradually come to understand it. We must get a firm and tight grasp on this work, carry it out in a painstaking, deep-going and penetrating way, properly solve certain problems arising from this policy and prevent and correct violations of policy, law and discipline.

Propaganda and education work is the basic work for promoting planned parenthood, and must be put in the primary position. The propaganda, media, cultural, arts, educational and public health departments and such bodies as the women's federations, trade unions and CYL must use all propaganda means and forms to carry out extensive, deep-going and ceaseless propaganda and education for the masses. Some places have succeeded in "taking three items as the main things" in planned parenthood propaganda work (taking propaganda and eduation as the main thing, such as between propaganda and education and economic measures; taking contraception as the main thing, such as between contraception and induced abortion; and taking regular work as the main thing, such as between regular work and shock work); and in propaganda and education they have "popularized three things" (population theory, contraceptive knowledge and eugenics knowledge). These are very good experiences that merit summing up and popularizing. By carrying out sustained and effective propaganda and education, we must ensure that every household and person knows about and understands this matter. In this way planned parenthood will truly become the spontaneous action of the masses.

The rural areas are the main target of planned parenthood work, and work there must be grasped well. At present, while summing up and perfecting the agricultural production responsibility systems, we must pay particular attention to setting up various types of planned parenthood responsibility systems and putting them on a sound basis, so that planned parenthood work will better suit the new situation following the institution of the agricultural production responsibility systems. At present, some places have instituted a "dual responsibility contract system" for production and planned parenthood and have truly implemented planned parenthood and contraceptive measures for each household and person; and some places have listed planned parenthood work as an important content of the grassroot cadre job responsibility systems, thus fully mobilizing the enthusiasm of the rural commune and brigade cadres to do a good job in planned parenthood work. These experiences should be summed up and popularized.

In order to further promote planned parenthood work, the localities throughout the country should also tackle the work of formulating and implementing their own population plans in accordance with the population policy laid down by the state and the population plan for the Sixth 5-Year Plan. These plans should be linked to local conditions and be specified so that they will be able to effectively control population and will also be practical.

It is necessary to step up scientific research and technical guidance, do a good job in producing and supplying contraceptive drugs and devices, improve the quality of surgery and ensure the safety of those who undergo operations. The public health and scientific research departments must also step up research and popularization of eugenics, and organize as soon as possible eugenics consultative services and premarriage and prenatal examinations so that all of our next generation may be more healthy and clever.

Planned parenthood work is a great cause benefiting the country and people and bringing happiness to our descendants. The millions of comrades taking direct or indirect part in this work throughout the country have made very great efforts. Many party and CYL members and cadres have played a model role in planned parenthood and set examples for the masses. We wish that comrades throughout the country would consolidate and develop the achievements and overcome the difficulties, and that, under the leadership of the CPC Central Committee and State Council, they will unite the people of the whole country to make new contributions in fulfilling the great task of controlling population growth, for the sake of accomplishing the "four modernizations" and revitalizing China.

OW192146 Beijing Domestic Service in Mandarin 1200 GMT 16 Aug 82

[Text] A national family planning conference was held in Beijing from 10 to 16 August. Wang Shoudao, vice chairman of the CPPCC National Committee and chairman of the China Family Planning Association, delivered an opening speech. Qian Xinzhong, minister in charge of the State Family Planning Commission, made a work report.

Qian Xinzhong said: We must strictly control the population growth and promote one child families in order to ensure the success of economic construction, our central task, and compatibility between economic and social development and population growth.

At conference meetings, representatives carefully reviewed how the central authorities' instructions had been implemented in all locations, analyzed the current family planning situation, summarized and exchanged personal experiences, studied the population plan and envisaged the population situation in the year 2000.

At the closing session on 16 August, Wang Hei, vice minister in charge of the State Family Planning Commission, spoke. He pointed out that family planning work is a major task having great bearing on the outcome of our socialist construction and a task that involves all families. Ideological work must be conducted again and again among all families and individuals. He said: What we are doing today is foundation work for our posterity to benefit a myriad of generations to come. As long as we are united and use proper methods, our task will certainly be accomplished.

DENG YINGCHAO ARTICLE COMMEMORATES HE XIANGNING

[Article by Deng Yingchao dated 16 August 1982: "Chinese Revolutionary Forerunner and Outstanding Woman Revolutionary -- Commemorating 10th Anniversary of Death of Comrade He Xiangning"]

[Text] Beijing, 22 Aug (XINHUA) -- He Xiangning is a name which radiates patriotic and revolutionary glory. Mentioning and thinking about her always evoke my deep memories of, and high respect for, her. Her name and life are closely connected with the course from China's old democratic revolution to its new democratic revolution, and its progress in socialist revolution and construction. She was among the first group of the Tong Meng Hui of China, organized by Dr Sun Yat-sen in 1905. Since they had formed their close relationship as husband and wife, she and her husband, Mr Liao Zhongkai, a great man who dedicated himself to the Chinese revolution, began their life as revolutionary comrades-in-arms in a joint struggle.

She was born to a rich family, but she generously offered everything to the revolution, including all her personal savings and dowry. Just like the course of the Chinese revolution, she suffered many setbacks in her life. However, she feared no difficulties or hardships, paid no attention to personal gain or loss, and courageously fought for more than half a century in order to save China and promote the revolution.

After the Kuomintang held its first national congress, reorganized itself and began KMT-CPC cooperation in 1924, she and Mr Liao Zhongkai became fighters faithfully and firmly implementing Sun Yat-sen's three new principles of the people and his three major policies. Therefore, they were hated by the Kuomintang rightists and the imperialists. When they were on their way to attend a Kuomintang standing committee meeting at the Kuomintang rightists and the imperialists. When they were on their way to attend a Kuomintang standing committee meeting at the Kuomintang central headquarters on the morning of 20 August 1925, Mr Liao Zhongkai was assassinated on the steps at the entrance to the central headquarters by an assassin jointly hired by the imperialists and the counterrevolutionary rightists of the Kuomintang. Mr Liaos's death caused irreparable loss to KMT-CPC cooperation when the revolution was being carried forward.

After hearing the news, I immediately rushed to the KMT central headquarters to express my condolences to our respected revolutionary forerunner He Xiangning, and tightly held her hand. She proved herself to be a strong revolutionary fighter. When I saw her, she did not abandon herself to grief. Filled with tears and imbued with anger and hatred, she was indignantly and bitterly condemning the murderer's atrocity. After that, I accompanied her in escorting Mr Liao's bier to Guangzhou to bury it to the left of Mr Zhu Zhexin's grave. (Now at Simagang, Guangzhou).

Not long after that, I and other comrades such as Gai Chang, Ou Mengjue and Gao Tianbo (who bravely sacrificed herself in the 30's) had the honor of joining the women's liberation movement under her leadership at Guangzhou, where the revolution started in Guangdong, and established a close work relationship and revolutionary friendship with her. When the northern expeditionary force entered Wuhan in 1926, the KMT central headquarters and the national government moved to Wuhan. Due to the needs of the revolution and her work, she also passed through many places and arrived in Wuhan. In April 1927, Chiang Kai-shek betrayed the revolution, and split with the Communist Party. He himself set up party and government organizations in Nanjing to oppose the KMT central authorities in Wuhan. Due to major setbacks of the revolution, I too arrived in Wuhan in the summer of 1927, after repeatedly suffering crises. The happiness and comfort to meet and see her after a separation of more than a year left me with an unforgettable impression. In July of the same year, Wang Jingwei worked hand in glove with Chiang Kai-shek. The "leftists" in Wuhan, led by Wang Jingwei, betrayed the revolution one after another, revolted against Sun Yat-sen's three new principles of the people and his three major policies, and split from the Communist Party.

At such a crucial moment during the revolution, woman revolutionary He Xiangning had shown a clear-cut revolutionary stand and resolutely made a clear break with Wang, Chiang and others. She left here post and went to Europe, where she led her life in exile as a tourist. However, she remained active as a staunch fighter and continued to carry out revolutionary activities abroad. After the "18 September" incident, she resolutely returned to China. Working shoulder to shoulder with Comrade Soong Ching Ling and all the anti-Japanese armymen and people in the whole country, she dedicated herself to the movement against Japanese aggression and for national salvation. Together with Liu Yazi, Chen Shuren and Jing Hengyi, she painted and wrote poems as sustenance for her feelings. She sold her works to raise funds in support of the war of resistance against Japanese aggression, while waging unremitting struggle.

The CPC Central Committee put forward a proposal in 1933 to suspend the civil war and call for joint efforts to deal with foreign aggression. In 1935 it again issued a call to establish a national united front against Japan. She and Comrade Soong Ching Ling got in touch with staunch KMT leftists in Shanghai, took the lead in responding to the call and made unremmiting efforts to carry it out.

After invading and occupying China's northeast area in 1931, Japanese imperialists again intruded into north China in July 1937, attacked the Lugou Bridge with artillery fire and provoked the "7 July" incident. At that time, the CPC had joined efforts with the KMT, and the 8th Route Army and other anti-Japanese troops rose, one after another, to resist the Japanese army. The Japanese army of aggression directed its artillery fire on Shanghai on "13 August." Under the iron heel of the Japanese bandits, Shanghai had entered the state of war. Patriot He Xiangning immediately organized women from all walks of life to resist Japanese aggression, set up women's organizations to extend greetings to the officers and men who fought in self-defense, and vigorously supported various activities to provide supplies and medicine for the army.

After Shanghai was engulfed in the flames of war, she was forced to move to Hong Kong, where she still organized women from all walks of life to hold meetings in support of the officers and men who were fighting the Japanese on the battle front, to carry out propaganda work and gather large amounts of supplies in support of those at the front.

I arrived in Hong Kong in the fall of 1938. I was very happy to meet her after we had been separated for 11 years. She led me to participate in various activities of women from all walks of life in Hong Kong and to carry out my work. She showed great concern for our party, for supplies for our army and over other major issues of state, such as the development of the national united front against Japanese aggression. She persistently carried out her work until the war in the Pacific broke out. Only then was she forced to leave Hong Kong. She first arrived in Dongjiang, Guangdong Province, went to several places and finally reached Guilin. Under artillery fire from the Japanese bandits in their war of aggression, she experienced many difficulties and obstacles, and led a rough, homeless life. Although she was already over 60 years old at the time, she was still full of lofty sentiments and aspirations, and highly enthusiastic in writing poems. The following are three poems which she wrote during the war of resistance against Japanese aggression:

Thoughts on the Trip Back to East Guangdong After the Fall of Hong Kong (written in 1942).

We have to leave for Haifeng after running out of food and water. However, we dare to pluck up courage to race against time. We may be blamed for the lack of time, but we would like to leave behind us the spirit which can be brought into full play by the next generation.

Thoughts on My Trip to Guilin After the Fall of Hong Kong (written in 1943).

My mind is more determined than ever, as I have to travel 10,000 li without a home. I do not want to be captured and insulted. I would rather die if our territories are not recovered. I must courageously forge ahead like a boat sailing against the current, or I will be driven back.

Thoughts on a Boat Trip to Guangxi To Avoid Calamity Caused by the Japanese (written in 1943).

War clouds are hovering over China. How can we not hate it when our country is in distress and our homes are in ruins? We only hope that our armymen and people join their efforts to defeat the enemy. We would feel fine even if we were homeless in a worn-out boat.

Her poems vividly describe her character and aspirations. Full of power and grandeur, they tell of her unflinching fighting spirit and lofty patriotic and revolutionary sentiments. When I reread these poems today, I am still immensely inspired and deeply touched.

When she arrived in Guilin, her son Liao Chengzhi had already been arrested by Chiang Kai-shek and was put behind bars in Jiangxi. For fear that she might come to Chongqing and make a scene there, Chiang and his men used both hard and soft tactics on her. Through her daughter, Comrade Liao Mengxing, they tried to dissuade her from going to Chongqing, and said such things as Chongqing was under heavy bombardment from enemy planes. They did not understand how this female revolutionary hated the acts of Sun Yat-sen's turncoats. She simply did not intend to go to where the Chiang family had established its small dynasty. She not only did not expect to obtain, but also flatly rejected, Chiang's so-called economic assistance. Instead, she chose to stay in Guilin and earn her living by selling paintings. She really proved herself to be a staunch fighter with revolutionary integrity. Only after Peiping was liberated in 1949 did she journey there by sea and by land. When we went to visit her -- although some of us were total strangers to her -- her ecstasy of delight could hardly be described in words. From then on, she settled in Beijing. Later, she attended the first CPPCC meeting and was elected as member of the Central People's Government and concurrently head of the Commission of Overseas Chinese Affairs of the government Administration Council. She won the people's respect for her efforts to mobilize patriotic overseas Chinese to support national construction and her concern for overseas Chinese rights and interests. Later, she was also elected vice chairman of the NPC Standing Committe, vice chairman of the CPPCC National Committee and chairman of the Central Committee of the Revolutionary Committee of the KMT; and she made great contributions in all respects.

Because of advanced age and physical weakness during her remaining years, her activities were somewhat limited. But she insisted on working and would paint a couple of hours every day. She was not only a revolutionary, but was also a painter with outstanding artistic talent. She was also a poet whose poems were mostly the expression of her patriotic and revolutionary zeal. She also wrote beautifully, but one could never detect any trace of femininity in the bold and strong brush strokes of her calligraphic works.

While in Beijing, comrades of the party Central Committee, Comrade Cai Chang, comrades of the National Women's Federation and I frequently visited her and consulted and exchanged opinions with her on state affairs, and each time she received us happily, cordially and warmly. Comrade Cai Chang and I cannot remember when we stopped calling her teacher and called her mother instead. But she also highly respected us and called us elder sisters. Such intimate revolutionary friendship established in the course of several decades can hardly be forgotten.

She painted Chinese paintings and was particularly good at painting lions and tigers. She said that Chinese people of all nationalities should wake up like an awakening lion and should be as dauntless as a tiger. She also loved to paint pines, bamboo and plum trees, which are known as the trio in winter because of their common capability of defying the bitter cold. Occasionally, she also painted chrysanthemums of all descriptions. All her paintings symbolized her revolutionary will and noble sentiments and integrity.

Over the past 50 years, female revolutionary He Xiangning served as the CPC's closest comrade in arms. She loved the CPC ardently and supported its policies, and she warmly loved the people and socialism. She paid particular attention to women and the women's liberation movement. Her stand was firm and she remained firm until she died. She really proved herself to be the banner and example of the KMT leftists.

During the tumultuous decade, she was also indirectly affected. Although she was displeased by what was happening, she was never pessimistic about the revolutionary cause. From this, we can see her broadmindedness and her firm conviction in the CPC and China's revolutionary cause.

When she became old and seriously ill, she was hospitalized. One day Comrade Cai Chang and I went to visit her and saw she was reading intently by her bedside lamp with a pair of reading glasses. We called her and interrupted her reading. When she saw us, she was very pleased and began to talk to us. When we asked what she was reading, she replied that she was reading the "Historical Annals" and would finish a chapter each day. As this example shows, she never stopped studying, even when she was old.

On 1 September 1972, she left us and passed away because of old age and protracted illness. When she was dying, the leading comrades of the party Central Committee, who visited her, told her that her wish of lying together with Liao Zhongkai in the same tomb would be fulfilled. This comforted her a great deal.

In early September 1972, representatives of the CPC Central Committee, Central Committee of the Revolutionary Committee of the KMT, her children, grandchildren and I escorted her casket to Liao Zhongkai's tomb near the Sun Yat-sen Mausoleum in Nanjing. She and Liao Zhongkai were a model couple of revolutionaries of the older generation. She proved herself to be an "exceptional woman" as Zongkai had praised her in the early years! With deep grief and highest respect, we bid her farewell before her tomb and that of Zhongkai. I said silently in my heart:

Eternal glory to you, He Xiangning, a revolutionary precursor of China and an exceptional female revolutionary!

[Text] Guangzhou, August 20 (XINHUA) -- A ceremony unveiling the newly rebuilt monument to Liao Zhongkai, who died at the hands of the right wing of the Kuomintang August 20, 1925, was held here this afternoon.

Liao was assassinated in front of the former headquarters of the Kuomintang Central Committee, and the following year, a monument to him was erected at the site by the third national labor meeting of the Communist Party. However, the monument was badly damaged during the "Cultural Revolution".

The new monument bears an inscription by Ye Jianying, chairman of the Standing Committee of the National People's Congress.

More than 100 people attended today's ceremony, among them being provincial and city government leaders, leaders of the city committee of the Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference, democratic parties and relatives of Liao.

Liang Lingguang, Guangzhou mayor, addressed the ceremony, saying today is the 50th anniversary of the death of Liao Zhongkai. "He was a democratic revolutionary," he said. "In his early years he took part in the overthrow of the Qing Dynasty. Under the leadership of Dr Sun Yat-sen, founder of the Kuomintang, in the early 1920s and influenced by the Chinese Communist Party, Liao helped Sun to reorganize the Kuomintang Party. He promoted the first cooperation in 1924-27 between the Kuomintang and the Communist Party. After Sun Yat-sen's death, Liao Zhongkai dedicated himself to Sun's unfinished cause."

FILM OF LATE KUOMINTANG STATESMAN LIAO ZHONGKAI

OW201234 Beijing XINHUA in English 1212 GMT 20 Aug 82

[Text] Guangzhou, August 20 (XINHUA) -- Shooting of a wide screen color film is to begin late this month by the Zhujiang Film Studio based here to mark the 57th anniversary of the death of Liao Zhongkai, a Kuomintang statesman during the Chinese democratic revolution.

A documentary reviewing the revolutionary activities of his wife He Xiangning will be screened on the occasion of the tenth anniversary of her death, which falls on September 1.

Liao Zhongkai was one of the earliest members of the Tong Meng Hui (the Chinese Revolutionary League) set up in 1905 by Sun Yat-sen, founder of Kuomintang. He made great contributions in promoting the first cooperation between Kuomintang and the Communist Party of China between 1924 and 1927. He was also one of Sun Yat-sen's main supporters and assistants in reorganizing Kuomintang in 1923. After the death of Sun Yat-sen in March 1925, Liao Zhongkai became the rallying banner of the left wing of Kuomintang. On August 20, 1925, he was assassinated by the right wing of Kuomintang.

The new film will mainly deal with Liao Zhongkai and his wife He Xiangning following Sun Yat-sen in the democratic revolution and supporting Sun Yat-sen in putting forward the three great policies of alliance with Soviet Russia, cooperation with the Chinese Communist Party and assistance to the peasants and workers.

The film will be directed by Tang Xiaodan.

CHINA DAILY Report

[By CHINA DAILY reporter]

[Text] China will establish its first international construction consultants' firm this month to meet China's construction needs, using foreign investments but giving full play to its own technicians and engineers.

In a press briefing yesterday, Li Yunjie, one of the sponsors of the new corporation, announced that the opening ceremony will be held on August 23, at which the chairman of the board of directors will be elected and a general manager named.

Li said China International Construction Consultants, Inc. (CICCI) will be joint enterprise, made up of 17 already existing consultatns' companies. It will carry out assignments from government departments, economic enterprises, financial and social groups or individuals at home or abroad.

It will advise them on construction projects and production managements and make economic evaluations and provide them with construction planning and personnel training programmes.

CICCI boasts more than 6,000 experts and qualified technicians in various fields, ranging from architecture and geology to highway construction.

During its preparation period, the corporation has established extensive and fruitful relationship with the outside world. In the past two years, many technicians have done research on the construction consultants' business in the United Kingdom, France, West Germany, Japan, and the United States. Now 33 technicians from the corporation are participating in training programmes in the United Kingdom and the United States.

The exchange goes both ways. Since 1979, the British consultants bureau and the American advisers' and engineers' council have visited Beijing and conducted seminars. In 1981, experts from the United Nations came to Beijing to give lectures.

"While the outside world has nearly 30 years in the consultant business," Li said, "China began to turn its attention to it only in 1979, after it had hastily signed an agreement to import 22 complete sets of equipment -- an agreement which turned out to be unrealistic."

This mistake drew China's attention to the urgency of establishing consultants' companies to carry out thorough investigations.

Since 1979, 11 enterprises have established their own consultants' companies, one after another. Now under the sponsorship of these companies, the joint corporation is going to appear.

"The establishment of CICCI is an indication that China's consultants' business is entering a new stage," Li said.

WAN LI ON PROTECTING, DEVELOPING RESOURCES

OW240223 Beijing XINHUA in English 1639 GMT 23 Aug 82

[Text] Beijing, August 23 (XINHUA) -- Vice-Premier Wan Li has called for "unremitting efforts" to do a still better job of protecting and developing China's land and sea resources, saying that this consitutes a "basic national policy."

"Through the unremitting efforts by the present and the next generations," he said on August 21 while receiving participants in a national work conference on water and soil conservation, "still better surroundings will be created for the Chinese people in their production and life."

The conference was held from August 16 to 22.

In the course of restructuring the state administrative organs, he said, China set up a Ministry of Urban and Rural Construction and Environmental Protection under the State Council, a territorial bureau under the State Economic Commission, and reorganized the Ministry of Geology and Minerals to strengthen the protection and utilization of mineral resources. The work of the National Bureau of Oceanography was strengthened. These steps showed the great importance attached by the state to the utilization and development of the country's land and sea resources, he said.

Water, soil, biological, mineral, oceanographic and other resources are the "fundamental conditions" for China's modernization, Wan Li said. Work must be done to change the situation in which such resources are misused due to a lack of understanding on the part of some departments and local authorities.

Vice-Premier Wan Li pointed to the necessity of publicizing the importance of protecting the country's resources and environment and educating the entire population about it. "From now on this must be written down in primary and middle school textbooks so that the younger generation may get to know its importance from childhood," he said.

Leaders of all levels, he said, must take the lead in acquiring through study knowledge on protection and utilization of resources. Without such knowledge, they are unqualified for directing China's modernization effort.

He called upon all government departments to work out as soon as possible national and regional plans for the utilization and development of China's land and sea resources and the protection of its environment.

EDITORIAL WANTS 'UNDERSTANDING' PEOPLE AS LEADERS

[Editorial: "It Is Necessary To Elect 'Understanding Persons' to Leading Posts"]

[Text] RENMIN RIBAO on 19 July carried the front-page report "Supplement Leading Bodies With Some 'Understanding Persons' [ming bai ren 2494 4101 0086] and Economic Results Will Markedly Improve." This has attracted extensive attention in the industry and communications system. Many comrades say that this has pinpointed the heart of the matter.

The term "understanding persons" is in fact a popular expression of the masses of people for those who have good sense. At present, a substantial number of workers in Beijing Municipality have proceeded from the actual conditions of the enterprises and endowed the saying with new meaning. The following are the qualities required of "understanding persons": 1) they must support the party line laid down at the third plenary session, firmly implement and put into practice the various principles and policies of the party and boldly resist unhealthy tendencies from all respects; 2) they must bear hardships, have enthusiasm, understand and know how to run business; and 3) they must have courage and insight, and be bold in blazing new trails. They must unite the comrades around them and open up new prospects. We have such "understanding persons" in the leading bodies of our enterprises, but they are small in number and far from meeting the needs of building the four modernizations.

There is much arduous and meticulous work to be done in the overall reorganization of enterprises. With the multitude of work, the key link is to reorganize and strengthen well the leading bodies and to elect more "understanding persons" to the leading bodies.

Provided there is a fine leading body, the rest of the work can proceed easily. Otherwise, even if we have conducted reorganization, there may be a temporary change in the aspect of the enterprises, but very soon they will return to the old ways. We must conscientiously remember this lesson encountered by various areas.

Judging by conditions in some areas, the leading bodies of a number of enterprises are not in a good spiritual mood, they are slack and weak and lack lofty revolutionary dedication. A substantial number of cadres are afraid of offending people and have no courage to uphold principles. People mock them as "seeking good relations with all and sundry at the expense of principle." Chaotic management of enterprises and lax discipline are usually related to this state of mind of leading cadres. "If one soldier is late, the general will lose the group." It is impossible to lead the ranks in promoting production if the leading cadres have selfish ideas and personal considerations and fail to rouse themselves. Those comrades who have these defects should realize the important historical task they are shouldering and strive to correct these defects as soon as possible. Those who have been patiently helped out yet proven incompetent should be dismissed from leading posts. A number of areas have implemented "transferring one or two to save the whole factory."

A situation commonly exists in which technical personnel in leading posts of enterprises are overaged, overstaffed, undereducated, or understaffed. Therefore, while conducting ideological reorganization, we must be determined to make suitable readjustment in the structure of leading bodies in accordance with the demands for revolutionization, specialization, and greater knowledge and lower age. In order to solve this problem well, we must have the courage to break through the traditional influence of arranging positions according to seniority and conscientiously implement party policy, particularly the policy on intellectuals.

In some of the enterprises, there is a strange phenomenon where, on one hand, there is an outcry over the shortage of qualified personnel, while on the other, there are large numbers of college and university graduates and also nongraduates who have gained knowledge and experiences through prolonged years of self-study who cannot play their role. Why not let those comrades who engaged in economic construction work during the 1960's or even in the early 1950's shoulder responsibility? Some comrades think that these people lack work experience in leadership. This viewpoint is wrong. Various construction personnel can only be trained by boldly using them, because only by boldly letting them work can they continuously accumulate experience. Whenever intellectuals are mentioned, some comrades think of them as arrogant. We do not agree with such an unsubstantiated viewpoint. Without self-confidence you can hardly do anything worthwhile. In our enterprises, we are not short of capable persons nor are we short of "understanding persons"; the problem is we must not suppress them, but enthusiastically find a method to open a way for them. There are a considerable number of leading organs that have not opened up such a way for the enterprises.

According to statistics, pre-"Great Cultural Revolution" college and university graduates, and those up to college level through self-study, total 5 million. If we let these people work, they can really be useful. We must grasp two points in conducting reorganization and restructuring: one is to restructure the management system, improve the economic responsibility systems, perfect rules and regulations, and organize production according to workers and quotas, and so on; the other is to reorganize and build a fine leading body and elect some "understanding persons" to form a leading body. The latter is more important than the former. It is impossible for an enterprise or a unit to make any progress without these "understanding persons" participating in the management of affairs. It is high time to be clear about the problem.

The reorganization and restructuring of leading bodies has been proposed for quite a few years now, but progress is not fast enough. Now, we can no longer delay. Departments and enterprises in all areas should put this work at the top of their agenda. At present, we must first and foremost reorganize and restructure well the 9,100 enterprises designated to be the first enterprises for overall reorganization, particularly the 1,800 large- and medium-sized backbone enterprises. In selecting talented persons to the leading posts, we should take a broad view and not act impetuously; we must not only consider those familiar people around us. Our veteran comrades in the leading groups at various levels should recommend comrades younger than themselves to the leading posts, and make this an important contribution to the party in their later years.

TAIWANESE REACTION TO PRC-U.S. COMMUNIQUE CITED

[Text] Beijing, Aug 20 (XINHUA) -- The Sino-U.S. communique on arms sales to Taiwan has caused alarm and grudges among the authorities on the island province, according to reports from Taibei.

Taiwan's CENTRAL NEWS AGENCY reported that the spokesman of the island's "Ministry of Foreign Affairs" accused the U.S. Government of having "committed a grave error". He expressed "regret over the U.S. Government's agreement to restrict arms sales to Taiwan quantitatively and qualitatively, which is an act violating both the letter and spirit of the Taiwan Relations Act."

Soong Chu-yui, "director-general of the Government Information Office of the Executive Yuan", told the three major American television networks Wednesday: "We are disappointed the U.S. has hurt us again." He questioned the U.S. Government for its "stand" and said "we have every reason to feel indignant, but we try our best to control such indignation."

Chiang Ching-kuo, speaking to the Standing Committee of the Kuomintang Central Committee, said: "At such a moment, we should not be in the least perplexed by the temporary world situation."

Taiwan newspapers in the last two days have complained about the communique, begging the U.S. Government to "actively carry out the Taiwan Relations Act".

PRC, TAIWAN TO MEET IN VOLLEYBALL CHAMPIONSHIPS

OW221702 Beijing XINHUA in English 1607 GMT 22 Aug 82

[Text] Yokohama, Japan, Aug 22 (XINHUA) -- China and host Japan continued the winning streaks when competitions went half way through at the ninth Pacific rim junior volleyball championships here today.

In the girl's section, China, after beating South Korea on August 19, outspiked Canada, the Japanese high school selection and Australia with a similar score of 3:0. In these encounters, the Chinese girls put up a gallant fight by bringing their hard smashing and net blocking into full play. They will face China's Taibei on August 24 and Japan in the finals on the following day.

In the boys section, China defeated Canada, New Zealand, Australia and the Japanese high school selection, all in straight sets. The Chinese will meet South Korea, Japan and China's Taibei in the next three remaining matches. South Korea and Japan also had four straight wins. It is, therefore, hard to predict which of the three squads will carry away the title.

In a girl's match with South Korea yesterday, China's Taibei conceded the first set 5-15 but rallied back to take the next three sets 16-14, 15-13 and 15-11 in a row. With this victory, China's Taibei moved a step closer to seek a berth in the last top three.

CHINA POST ASSAILS U.S.-PRC JOINT COMMUNIQUE

OW230635 Taipei CHINA POST in English 18 Aug 82 9 4

[Editorial: Ronald Reagan Succumbs to Peiping's Blackmail]

[Text] The so-called "Shanghai communique II" as issued by Washington and Peiping simultaneously last evening represents U.S. President Ronald Reagan's succumbing to Peiping's blackmail.

The essence of that communique deals with the issue of U.S. arms sales to the Republic of China, in which Peiping has no right to interfere. Yet the United States has fallen into the Chinese Communist trap of discussing with the Peiping leaders repeatedly over this issue, thereby giving the Peiping leaders the perfect excuse to advance its blackmail demands.

The communique states that the U.S. Government does not seek to carry out a long-term policy of arms sales to Taiwan. It further states that the sales will not exceed the quality or quantity of recent years, since diplomatic relations were established with Peiping in 1979. The United States also declares it intends gradually to reduce its sales of arms to Taiwan, leading, over a period of time, to a final resolution.

These three commitments made by the United States constitute a clear violation of the Taiwan Relations Act which was passed by the U.S. Congress to protect the vital interests of Taiwan and its 18 million free people. For the Taiwan Relations Act obliges the U.S. president to supply arms sales to the Republic of China in accordance with its defense requirements. It also prohibits boycott or embargo to be imposed on the Republic of China, which constitute aggression against this country.

The question to be asked is, does President Reagan's commitment not to sell arms to Taiwan constitute Chinese Communist embargo of arms to Taiwan? If it does, then President Reagan's commitment constitutes a violation of the Taiwan Relations Act by a U.S. president who has the sworn duty of carrying out the act which is the law of the land for all Americans, including the U.S. president.

The meaning of the term "final resolution" is also obscure. U.S. observers throught that it was Reagan's way of avoiding setting a final date. However, the Chinese Communist Foreign Ministry spokesman said Tuesday that "final resolution" certainly implies that U.S. arms sales to Taiwan "must be completely terminated over a period of time."

In exchange of all the U.S. commitments to Peiping in compliance with its many demands, the United States got nothing in return except Peiping's phoney profession of peaceful intentions. It is now expected that a package will be submitted to Congress for renewal of an F-5E jet fighter co-production agreement with Taiwan for its approval. This program, it may be noted, has been pending for a long time and it was purposely delayed to accommodate Peiping's wishes.

President Reagan's statement accompanying the issuance of the communique said that the agreement embodies a mutual satisfactory means of dealing with the historic question of U.S. arms sales to Taiwan. On this point, Reagan can only speak for himself, as all the Chinese people will not be satisfied with Reagan's way of solving this issue. On the contrary, they will resent it as it would prolong the mainland people's sufferings endlessly when the Republic of China is denied the right to purchase arms for its legitimate self-defense.

President Reagan also stated that the agreement would promote the further development of friendly relations between Washington and Peiping and contribute to reducing tensions and to lasting peace in the Asia-Pacific region. Reagan must be deluding himself. He has just sowed the seeds of another war in this region by encouraging Chinese Communist aggression while depriving the only force -- that of the Republic of China -- capable of countering Peiping's aggressive moves if it could have the needed weapons and planes. The denial of such needed arms to the ROC will embolden the Chinese Communists to seize Taiwan by force. It will be able to invade Taiwan when the latter has been weakened sufficiently by the denial of U.S. arms sales and planes.

The people of the Republic of China should support our government in lodging the strongest protest to the U.S. Government on its latest betrayal of our vital interests. The United States has gone back on its promise of "we are not going to abandon our longtime allies and friends on Taiwan", as promised by President Reagan to the American people and the people of Taiwan. He has just succumbed to Peiping's blackmail and betrayed his own words of reassurances. We should prepare for the worst while hoping for the best. It is the time for all of us to rally together against the Chinese Communists even more than ever before.

BAN LIFTED ON IMPORT OF 842 JAPANESE GOODS

OW211429 Taipei CNA in English 1345 GMT 21 Aug 82

[Text] Taipei, Aug 21 (CNA) — The Republic of China lifted the ban effective Saturday on the imports of 842 items of Japanese consumer goods. Economics Minister Chao Yao-tung made the announcement at a press conference.

These goods constitute about 25 percent of the total import value of the 1,500 items of Japanese products originally banned by the government, Chao said.

He stressed that the visit here of a high-level Japanese mission led by Masumi Esaki had achieved a breakthrough in the continuing trade talks between Japan and the Republic of China.

Despite the appearance of such political matters as Japan's attempt to revise its war records in history textbooks, the government regards the lifting of the ban on these items as being previously agreed upon and should be considered purely from the economic viewpoint, Chao said.

He said the imposition of a ban on the import of foreign products is incompatible with the principle of free trade. "The government took the action in February this year at great pains in order to call Japan's attention to sincerely take steps to narrow the trade imbalance between the two countries."

The Esaki mission has reassured the Republic of China of Japan's sincerity in efforts to close the trade gap and to help the country transform its economic structure, Chao said.

The Japanese products allowed to be imported again include foodstuffs, electrical appliances, flavors, jewelry with a value totaling about 30 million U.S. dollars.

BRIEFS

ARAB LEAGUE TRADE DEFICIT — Taipei, Aug 10 (CNA) — The trade imbalance of the Republic of China with the six countries of the Arab League last year ran as much as $3,239 million. Experts are proposing that the Chinese products exported to the Middle East market should be diversified and other Mid-East markets should be explored. According to a recent report by the International Commercial Bank of China, the ROC's total trade with the six countries of the Arab League in 1981 amounted to $5.1 billion. Exports came to $939 million, and imports, $4,179 million. The six countries of the league are Kuwait, Saudi Arabia, the United Arab Emirates, Oman, Bahrain and Qatar. Compared with the statistics of 1973, the ROC's trade with the six countries has increased 29.3 times, but imports have expanded 36.6 times. [Text] [Taipei CNA in English 0254 GMT 10 Aug 82 OW]

WEN WEI PO URGES SUZUKI TO ACT ON TEXTBOOK ISSUE

[Editorial: "Suzuki Must Make a Prudent Choice"]

[Text] In dealing with the angry tide opposing the distortion of history, the Japanese Government cannot stall for a long time. On the 27th of this month, Foreign Minister Yoshio Sakurauchi will be going on a long journey and in September Prime Minister Zenko Suzuki will visit China. It is necessary to appropriately settle the revision of textbooks before their departures. Otherwise, friendly visits will turn into anti-Japanese demonstrations. When that time comes, they will go off cheerfully but come back disappointed.

The Education Ministry is still impenetrably thickheaded in its attitude. At first, it shirked its responsibility by shifting the blame of distorting history onto the professors it had employed, but it was rebuffed when the professors replied to the charges. Next, on the pretext of rejecting "interference in internal affairs," it attempted to silence the various countries which had suffered aggression and to allow the Japanese "advance." Later, it sent officials to China to explain the matter. However, they only stated their views but did not take any action to correct the errors. Recently, it raised another argument that "it will take 3 years to examine and approve textbooks," in an attempt to shelve the matter.

Officials of the Education Ministry, please examine your conscience: Where are you leading the Japanese nation by instilling the concept of aggression into the national consciousness? Are you arousing a sense of national self-respect and pride or are you driving the Japanese people to expand abroad? It is true that the Japanese nation is a promising one. Its vigorous economy, its sophisticated science and technology and its international influence are sufficient for the Japanese people to take pride in them. However, embellishment of the history of aggression and holding up war criminals as national heroes are by no means the happiness of the nation, nor can they cultivate genuine national feelings. They will only poison the national consciousness, reduce the Japanese people to its tools of aggression and land the Japanese nation in a position beyond redemption. The officials of the Education Ministry should come to a profound and complete realization and not deceive the nation in the name of the "nation."

The Japanese people have good sense. Several hundred Japanese students and inhabitants held a protest rally and demonstration in front of the Ministry of Education, showing the common indignation of the Japanese people. Japan published a new book entitled "Burn All, Kill All, Loot All," which exposed its crimes of invading China. This indicates that the Japanese people will never forget the lessons drawn from history. This indignation and these lessons are where the hope of the Japanese nation lies. This makes it possible for Japan to constantly adjust its course and embark on the road toward peace and development.

There are differences of opinion within the Japanese Government. The distortion of history carried out by the Education Ministry only represents the desire of a handful of militarists. Foreign Minister Yoshio Sakurauchi raised an objection to the Education Ministry by asking it to consider international public opinion and restore history to its original condition. It is feared that the differences within the Japanese Government can only be ruled upon by Prime Minister Zenko Suzuki. True, Suzuki's presence at the Yasukuni Shrine in his capacity as the Japanese prime minister reflected his outworn political consciousness; however, his stuttering speech also revealed that he still did not dare to rashly deviate from what is permissible and enrage the various Asian countries. We hope that on the questions of diplomacy that affect major relations between Japan and east Asian countries, Prime Minister Suzuki will not take an ambivalent attitude, still less take a wrong step.

Japan is universally acknowledged as a great economic power. It exports enormous funds, technology and products to east Asia and also imports raw materials. This is the key to maintaining and developing the Japanese economy. If the textbook issue results in strained diplomatic relations, economic and trade exchanges will be affected and the history of boycotting Japanese goods may possibly repeat itself. This is something that Japan does not want to see and this is also something that the Chinese people do not want to do. Viewed from these practical interests, Japan should also respect history and the desire of various countries which suffered aggression.

It is reported that Prime Minister Suzuki has a proper plan for resolving the issue. We shall wait and see the developments. It is hoped that he will be able to iron out the differences between China and Japan and further develop Sino-Japanese friendship. If he stops at oral expressions and refuses to take any practical actions to rectify the errors, the Chinese people will never agree to this.

PRC PLANS TO REORGANIZE FOREIGN TRADE REPORTED

HK240226 Hong Kong SOUTH CHINA MORNING POST in English 24 Aug 82 -- Business News p 1

[By Julie Auyeung]

[Text] China is close to completing plans to reorganise its foreign trade activities. The object is to stop the operation of non-approved establishments in Hong Kong, and to redefine responsibilities of its ministries, bureau and corporations.

China is going to stop operation of those companies which are set up in Hong Kong without approval from the State Council, China trade sources said.

It is estimated that there may be around 300 such sompanies which act as the trading arms for local production units in various Chinese provinces. Many of these companies have Hong Kong partners and their cooperation is usually in the form of joint ventures. Some of them are solely owned by enterprises in China and some have appointed representatives.

Despite the fact that they are registered in Hong Kong, they represent provincial interests with the aim of expanding foreign trade. However, this has created problems. Sources cited one example of a production unit which had kept most of its production to be marketed by the Hong Kong representative while handing over a small portion to the foreign trade corporation in China. This has resulted in price differences.

At present, there are more than 10 Chinese companies in Hong Kong set up with approval from the State Council. Some of them were established in the past two years, while others have been here a long time.

The newly established companies are: China Ever-Best Machinery Enterprises Co Ltd., China United Shipbuilding Co Ltd. and trading companies representing Guangdong, Tianjin, Fujian, Shanghai and Beijing.

The procedure of setting up these companies takes a long time, but it is usually initiated by a Chinese corporation. The approval of the State Council is necessary. Even the appointment of senior officials has to be agreed on by the State Council. For example, in one of the above-mentioned companies, all positions above the managerial level are taken up by people sent from China.

Apart from the plan to reorganize their trading activities in Hong Kong, sources added that China is also in the process of redefining responsibilities of its ministries, bureaus and corporations. The desire for job redefinition came from growing business activities and the huge industrial and trading structure in China.

HONG KONG, PRC CONSIDERING LIGHT RAIL SYSTEM

HK210207 Hong Kong HONG KONG STANDARD in English 21 Aug 82 pp 1, 2

[By Christine Cheung]

[Text] Both Hong Kong and China are seriously considering building a light rail system between Lowu and Shenzhen to improve the traffic flow, a source said yesterday. The source said the proposal for such a project was put forward by the governor of Guangdong, Liu Tianfu, to Sir Edward Youde during his first official visit to China as the governor of Hong Kong.

Both sides felt the need for the project, the source said, and it was agreed that experts from the two places would work together to study the feasibility of the plan.

"The actual arrangements will have to be discussed with experts," said Sir Edward, when he was asked to comment on the proposal during a press briefing on his train trip from Guangzhou to Shenzhen yesterday morning.

Sir Edward yesterday finished his two-day visit to China after meeting senior Guangdong officials and visiting the Shenzhen Special Economic Zone.

He said their discussions included topics about the crossing point between China and Shenzhen [as published] and what could be done to improve the flow of passengers and freight from Hong Kong to Shenzhen and vice versa. "We were talking about Shenzhen station and the connection between each side of the border and what could be done to facilitate the flow of traffic," said Sir Edward.

He noted that there were large numbers of people crossing there and they wanted to make it as easy as they could. He said there were "some difficulties with the topography but we are doing what we can on that."

The 700-metre passageway between the two locations -- Lowu and Shenzhen -- is a narrow stretch of land and during the busy season, the packed crowds and the busy train service create potential hazards to the passengers. The source said Sir Edward also realised the risk in the passageway and the urgent need to solve the problem.

And it is understood that besides the rail system, both sides have to consider arrangements at the checkpoints. However, the governor also added that: "I didn't come to reach concrete aggreements; I came to talk to them and to talk to them in general terms about how we improve the relationship between the two places," he said.

Sir Edward said he chose this time to visit Guangzhou because of its close relationship with Hong Kong. He said he had been trying to see many people and places in Hong Kong during his governorship for the past three months, and that he decided to put his visit to Guangdong high on the agenda to meet people there.

He had planned to cover three to four things in the visit. These included: to meet and get to know senior Guangdong officials; to hear from them about the economic development in the province; and to see something of the investment which people from Hong Kong are making in Guangzhou. The 1997 lease, however, was not on the agenda because they only discussed local issues. And it was not known whether Sir Edward would be going to Beijing in September because, he said, it took time to make preparations.

When commenting on the planned nuclear plant in Shenzhen, approval of which was announced by Chinese officials yesterday, Sir Edward said they did have some talks about power supply in Guangdong but not about specific projects. He said there were many nuclear plants built round the world, and that they were observing safety requirements which were being improved all the time. However, he declined to talk about the contribution of the plant to Hong Kong or the possibility of enhancing people's confidence in Hong Kong's future in connection with the construction of such a project.

In his tour of Shenzhen yesterday, the governor, escorted by the mayor of Shenzhen, and Vice-Governor of Guangdong Liang Xiang, visited Shekou and two factories in Shenzhen.

COMPANIES VIE FOR SERVICES TO PRC OIL EXPLORATION

HK210346 Hong Kong SOUTH CHINA MORNING POST in English 21 Aug 82 -- Business News p 1

[By Julie Ayueung]

[Text] More than 300 local companies have contacted China Offshore Oil Services (Hong Kong) Ltd (COOS) to vie for contracts to provide support services for China's offshore oil exploration. They include banks, shipping companies, supply vessel operators, aircraft manufacturers or agents, caterers and drilling mud and chemical manufacturers.

Intensive preparation work is also being done by COOS's parent company - the Guangzhou-based Nanhai Oil Joint Services Corp, which was formed in May to oversee support services in southern China.

Nanhai has established subsidiary companies in Guangzhou, each of which will look after one type of support service -- catering, accommodation, helicopters, supply vessels, drilling materials and telecommunications.

Nanhai Oil's deputy chairman and general manager, Mr Chen Lizhong, told Business News yesterday that though these subsidiaries are still in the process of enlargement and consolidation, work has already been defined for each of them. They will now study proposals by foreign servicing companies and more detailed negotiations will be carried out later. Guangzhou will become the headquarters for oil activities in southern China, Mr Chen said. "We are also quickening the speed of work such as building hotels or residential complexes, training interpreters, drivers and people in the servicing industry to meet with the influx of foreign oilmen," he said.

Since servicing covers a wide area, there is a need to form other joint-venture companies with foreign parties which then will act as operators for various support activities.

Mr Chen said that to avoid monopolies and foster competition, there will be, on average, two or three operators for each of the support service activities. Business News has learnt the Chinese will want a majority share in each joint venture formed to act as an operator.

The 100 bids submitted by 33 oil companies tendering for China's offshore oil concessions were unsealed yesterday at a ceremony in Beijing. They were initially placed in safety boxes by the president of China National Offshore Oil Corp, Mr Qin, and a senior official of China's foreign trade bureau, Mr Wu Jie. A committee will screen them and select successful bidders within the next three months.

NATO OFFICIAL WARNS OF WARSAW PACT THREAT

[Text] Brussels, August 22 (XINHUA) -- The Warsaw Pact has taken the advantage of detente to improve its armed forces to a remarkable extent, said Allied Commander-in-Chief Channel Admiral John Fieldhouse in an interview with NATO REVIEW published in its August issue. The admiral noted the evidence he has seen leaves him in no doubt about this and the leaders of the Warsaw Pact do not even deny it.

Fieldhouse said the alliance needs to pay greater and continuing attention to "countering threats at sea" because the Soviet Union has the largest submarine fleet in the world. "The aggressor has the advantage of flexibility and surprise," he added. He complained about the big reduction of NATO's mine counter-measure vessels during the last twenty years.

However, he was confident that the peace in Europe can be maintained through the difficult decade to come if NATO nations continue to show their resolve to prevent the threat of force from dictating the Soviet foreign policy.

The group will also strengthen international legal cooperation in the field and increase contacts and business relations with foreign organizations. Ren Jianxin, vice-chairman of the China Council for the Promotion of International Trade, was elected president of the group.

AUSTRALIAN PREMIER HAILS JOINT COMMUNIQUE

OW241914 Beijing XINHUA in English 1839 GMT 24 Aug 82

[Text] Canberra, August 24 (XINHUA) -- Australian Prime Minister Malcolm Fraser said that he believed the Chinese-U.S. communique on the arms sale issue should be welcomed in Australian Parliament, according to a release from the prime minister's office today. Answering a question in the Parliament on August 18, Fraser said the joint communique between China and the U.S. on the question of U.S. arms sales to Taiwan "puts to rest a dispute which had potential for a serious breach in relations between the two countries."

It was to the credit of both China and the U.S. that an agreement had been reached on the arms sale problem, Fraser added.

Fraser described as the "critical element" paragraph six in the Chinese-U.S. joint communique. In this paragraph the U.S. Government states that its arms sales to Taiwan will not exceed, either in qualitative or in quantitative terms, the level of those supplied in recent years and that it intends to gradually reduce such sales leading to a final resolution. The prime minister warned that a continuing dispute in Chinese-U.S. relations would possibly produce "far-reaching consequences" in the Pacific.

The joint communique "is something that the whole (Australian Parliament) House should applaud," Fraser said.

U.S. IMPORTERS SAY MUSHROOMS POSE NO THREAT

OW250851 Beijing XINHUA in English 0807 GMT 25 Aug 82

[Text] Washington, August 24 (XINHUA) -- The U.S. International Trade Commission (ITC) held hearings here today on a petition submitted on June 30 by the American Mushroom Institute against imported mushrooms from China. Representatives of the American institute which is acting on behalf of 16 U.S. canners argued at the hearings that imports of canned mushrooms from China are "increasing rapidly" and causing "market disruption" in the United States. They requested that restrictions be imposed on such imports.

These arguments were rebutted in a day-long testimony by both Chinese and American companies concerned.

Bruce E. Clubb, counsel for China national cereals, oil, foodstuffs import and export corporation, said before the ITC that in the past year, not only have total canned mushroom imports in the United States not increased, they have actually declined, both absolutely and as a percentage of U.S. consumption.

He pointed out that starting from a low base after being granted the MFN (most favored nation) tariff treatment in 1980, the PRC has increased its exports of mushrooms to the United States to 32 million pounds for the marketing year of 1981-82. The increase, he noted, amounted to only 9.8 percent of U.S. consumption. It so far has only displaced other imports and poses no threat to the U.S. industry.

Bart S. Fisher and Charles S. Pearson, representatives of the U.S. Nature's Farm Products, a major canned mushroom importer, pointed out in their testimony that even if the level of imports from one source, the PRC, has increased, it makes no sense to consider that a domestic industry has suffered from "market disruption" caused by imports when total imports in fact declined by about 25 percent in 1981 with the help of a stiff duty on imports.

They believed that the American canners are victims not of unfair practices by China but by a growing consumer preference for fresh mushrooms, of a recession that has reduced the buying of non-essentials, and of fear of botulism, a lethal form of food poisoning, which consumers associate with the American products.

In his statement to the commission, Christopher H. Phillips, president of the National Council for United States-China Trade, demanded that the imports of Chinese mushrooms should not be halted by an unnecessary proceeding against China's canned mushrooms.

He said: "We must look at this investigation in the broader context of our bilateral trade relationship with the People's Republic of China. The U.S. has maintained a considerable surplus in bilateral trade with the Chinese since trade resumed in 1971." He hoped that the mushroom issue should not become a roadblock to further development of trade between the two countries.

After today's hearings, the ITC will value the arguments from all sides and make a decision by the end of September.

OW191644 Beijing XINHUA in English 1627 GMT 19 Aug 82

[Text] Beijing, August 19 (XINHUA) -- A protocol to amend the civil air transport agreement and its side letters between the Government of the People's Republic of China and the Government of the United States of America was signed here today. The Chinese and U.S. civil aviation delegations held consultations in Beijing between August 9 and 14. They discussed the time of operation of the second designated airlines, opening of the second air route and stopover rights.

Under the protocol, the second route in both directions will be Beijing (for all-cargo service only) -- Guangzhou -- Shanghai -- Tokyo or another point in Japan -- Honolulu or Seattle -- Los Angeles -- San Francisco -- Chicago. Since the United States unilaterally enjoys traffic rights in Japan, CAAC airliners shall be entitled to enjoy full stopover rights at all United States points on the specified routes.

The protocol was signed on behalf of their respective governments by Li Shufan, leader of the civil aviation delegation of the Chinese Government and head of the International Affairs Department of the General Administration of Civil Aviation of China, and Matthew V. Scocozza, leader of the U.S. Government civil aviation delegation and deputy assistant secretary for transportation and telecommunications of the State Department.

Suzuki Pledges Solution

[Text] Tokyo, August 23 (XINHUA) -- Japanese Prime Minister Zenko Suzuki said today that he would "take final responsibility" if asked for "final say" on the problem of distortions of wartime history by the Japanese Education Ministry. Suzuki said this at a nation-wide televised press conference at his official residence. The problem will be solved without fail before his scheduled visit to China next month, he added.

Japan, he said, felt profoundly responsible for the great damage caused by the war in the past to the people of China and other neighbouring nations. Based on this repentance, Japan had up to now been engaged in efforts to enhance the relations of mutual trust and friendship and cooperation (with China) since the normalization of relations between the two countries. The acknowledgements reflected in the Japan-China joint statement had undergone no change at all, and a correct reflection of these acknowledgements in the textbooks was a matter of course, he added.

Asked whether mistakes in the textbooks would be corrected, Suzuki said specific measures were now sought in earnest to this end.

In replying to another question, Suzuki said that the textbook dispute this time had greatly hurt the feelings of the people of China and other neighbouring countries. It constituted an important problem. He noted that it would be a very grave problem if the relations of friendship, cooperation and mutual trust Japan had established with its neighbours were damaged. Hence, Japan should keep in heart deeply those sacrifices, damage and sufferings that it gave to the people of its neighbouring countries in the past war. Meanwhile, there was the need for Japan to accept humbly the dissatisfaction and repudiation of those countries, and further efforts should be made to establish friendly and amicable relations with them in future.

Suzuki said that not long ago directors of the Foreign and Education Ministries were sent to China to sound out Chinese views and criticisms. Now it is necessary to take full count of these conditions and handle the issue in ways acceptable to China. An intense study of the issue is being made.

Asked by a Japanese correspondent to comment on Japanese aggression in the past in Asia, Suzuki replied that what Japan had done before and during World War II should be left to historians of future generations to judge. However, it was true that China had regarded it as aggression and it was also regarded as such internationally. There had been severe appraisal, criticism and repudiation of it. The Japanese Government must be fully aware of this situation, Suzuki said.

When asked whether a "political decision" was to be made on the textbook problem, Suzuki said: "Now, a final solution to this problem is being studied under the vigorous leadership of the chief Cabinet secretary. If he asks me to make the final decision, I would do it responsibly."

Press Urges Suzuki Action

[Text] Tokyo, August 24 (XINHUA) -- Japanese newspapers carried editorials today to urge Prime Minister Zenko Suzuki to make a prompt decision to have the false textbook descriptions about Japanese aggression corrected. The newspapers were commenting on the statement made public yesterday by Suzuki on the textbook problem.

The editorial of YOMIURI SHIMBUN pointed out: "The crux of the textbook problem lies in the question whether the war in the past was one of aggression. On this question, the prime minister said that China deems it one of aggression, so does world opinion. It is true there are such harsh judgement, criticism and cognition. It is necessary for the government to fully understand the circumstances. Thus, he evaded any personal decision. Nor did he offer any idea about the concrete measures to be taken for major correction."

The editorial said: "What worries us is that no measures acceptable to the people of Japan and other Asian countries can be taken if the need to follow the usual procedure is stressed so as to have the matter handled within the framework of the existing revision system."

The editorial stressed that "it is imperative for the prime minister to make a firm decision personally" on a solution to the textbook problem. No equivocal measure would work with the ordinary people, who had suffered the disasters of the war, it added.

NIHON KEIZAI SHIMBUN said editorially although the prime minister deeply sensed Japan's responsibility for the tremendous damage done to the neighbouring states by the war, "he did not express his views about the key question of correcting the wording in the textbooks, nor did he mention when and in what way the correction should be made."

"The Japanese Government must not express repentance verbally only. What is important is when and how it will act," the editorial said. It added: "There can be no solution to such a highly political problem without a decision by the prime minister himself."

ASAHI SHIMBUN said in an editorial that on the textbook problem, one felt the prime minister was still taking a wait-and-see attitude as he said that what Japan had done before and during World War II should be left to historians of future generations to judge. "Is it true that Prime Minister Suzuki has no conception of history of his own?" the editorial asked.

Wang Bingnan Comments

OW241656 Beijing XINHUA in English 1635 GMT 24 Aug 82

[Text] Beijing, August 24 (XINHUA) -- A reception was held here this evening for the Japanese people-to-people friendly get-together delegation led by Namio Egami, noted Japanese archaeologist and president of the Pan-Asia Culture Communication Center. The reception was given by the Chinese People's Association for Friendship With Foreign Countries and presided over by its president, Wang Bingnan.

The 160 members of the delegation, from Gunma, Oita and Tokyo, are all lovers of Japanese folk songs and dances. They will hold a celebration with people in Beijing tomorrow to mark the 10th anniversary of the normalization of the relations between China and Japan.

Wang Bingnan said in his toast that the last 10 years saw great development in the relations and friendly contacts between the two countries in the fields of foreign affairs, economics, culture, science and technology.

"However, an adverse current has come up just when the peoples of the two countries are celebrating the 10th anniversary of the normalization of the relations between the two countries," he said.

"Some people in Japan refuse to acknowledge the crisis committed by Japanese militarists in their invasion of China and other Asian countries.

"The distortion of history in textbooks censored by the Japanese Ministry of Education will mislead future generations. This has aroused the indignation of the Chinese people and peoples of other Asian countries and strong opposition from the Japanese people and friends of various circles," he said.

Wang Bingnan also said that on the 10th anniversary of the normalization of Sino-Japanese relations, "we must be vigilant and clear any blocks in developing our friendship. We should draw lessons from the reminiscence of what happened 37 years ago and firmly uphold the spirit of the Sino-Japanese joint statement and the Sino-Japanese treaty of friendship to continue our friendship from generation to generation."

Namio Egami said in his toast the diversification and variety of exchanges between Japan and China in various fields in the last ten years are something rarely found in the last few centuries. "The friendship between Japan and China is a great contribution to peace and stability in Asia and the world," he said.

He said: "The possibility for the friendly relations between the two countries and peoples lies in our joint statement and treaty of friendship, which ended the miserable history of aggression against China by Japanese militarists."

He said it is impossible for mutual understanding when the historical fact of aggression is distorted. "If we refuse to make any introspection on the misery of people under occupation and oppression, we are shirking our responsibility for historical facts."

He said that the friendship between the two countries is a historical mission for the Japanese and Chinese peoples. "All Japanese people who wish for friendly relations between Japan and China should take the situation as a whole into consideration, distinguish clearly between right and wrong, be united and make concerted efforts."

Present at the reception were: Chu Tunan and Lin Lin, vice-presidents of the Chinese People's Association for Friendship With Foreign Countries; Wang Xiaoyi, president of the Beijing branch of the association; and Sun Pinghua, vice-president of the China-Japan Friendship Association. Also present was Hiromoto Seki, minister of the Embassy of Japan in China.

Association Adopts Resolution

[Text] Tokyo, August 24 (XINHUA) -- "We will not allow educating Japanese youth for one year, let alone for two years, with such textbooks in which aggression is distorted as advance and worse still, the responsibility for the Nanking massacre is shifted onto China."

This is a passage in a resolution adopted by the Japan-China Friendship Association at a meeting here this evening. The resolution accused the Japanese Government of refusing to correct textbook mistakes in disregard of strong criticism both at home and abroad under the pretext that the existing textbook revision system in Japan should persist. The Japanese Government, it added, had acted perfunctorily when it promised to move up the next textbook revision, originally scheduled for three years later, by one year.

The key note of the meeting, attended by some 200 personalities from all circles, was that the Japanese Government should correct the mistakes in the textbook revision.

Tokuma Utsunomiya, chairman of the Japan-China Friendship Association, and other speakers at the meeting criticised the Japanese Government for mishandling the textbook affair.

The director general of the association, Toshio Kurihara, pointed out in his report that the point of departure for fostering friendship with China should be no other than a serious introspection by the Japanese Government of Japan's agression against China.

A MAINICHI SHIMBUN correspondent said Prime Minister Zenko Suzuki's news conference yesterday was "most disappointing," because the prime minister spoke of Japan's past invasion of China so lightly as if he were referring to a car collision.

Masami Emoto, member of the Liaison Council for Repatriates From China (orthodox), exposed with his own experience in the aggressive war against China the various crimes committed by the Japanese militarists in incendiary, [as received] killing and looting. "What was that advance like? That was out and out aggression," he said.

Masami said: "Aggression is aggression. We must fight firmly against the attitude of the government which holds history in contempt."

At the meeting, Toshiichi Uno, writer of Japanese history textbooks and professor of the Chiba University, and Yushio Koshima, writer of world history textbooks and professor of the Nihon University, disclosed how the Education Ministry directed them to distort historical facts. Messages of support from Japan-China Friendship Associations in Osaka and the Saitama, Aichi, Hyogo, Lbaragi and Mie Prefectures were read out at the meeting.

HISTORIANS PRAISE JOINT PRC-JAPAN FILM

[Text] Beijing, August 15 (XINHUA) -- "Truthful to History" is the concensus of Chinese historians, film critics, writers and friendship association veterans who saw a preview of "The Game Yet To Finish," co-produced by the Tokyo Tokuma Corporation of Japan and the Beijing film studio of China. The film will be released some time later in Tokyo and Beijing, in commemoration of the tenth anniversary of the normalization of diplomatic relations between the two countries.

According to Wang Yang, Chinese producer and head of the Beijing film studio, when the project was discussed a few years ago and in the actual filming, all those involved, both Chinese and Japanese, had the clear purpose of offering a lesson to the two peoples who wish to live in friendship from generation to generation, through depicting the war-torn lives of a Chinese go-chess player and his Japanese friend.

The efforts were successful, those who saw it agreed. "Well timed," stated a historian, Li Shu, after contrasting the film with the recent distortions of history in school textbooks by the Japanese Ministry of Education.

The film has a dominant theme of friendship, but it does not evade the fact that Japan's war against China brought great suffering to the Chinese people. There are shots from documentaries showing the Japanese aggressors slaughtering, burning and looting that provide authentic historical background against which the plot develops. The story evolves around how the Chinese player loses his wife, daughter and son during the war.

Zhao Puchu, vice-president of the China-Japan Friendship Association, and Zhong Dianfei, president of the China Film Critics Society, drew the lessons of the war in pithy phrases -- "past experience, if not forgotten, guide to the future" and "one need not look far for the lesson."

Zhao Puchu pointed out that the film warns the Chinese and Japanese, while engaged in friendly contacts, not to lose vigilance against the danger of a revived Japanese militarism.

The two chess masters in the film, who admire each other, had their first friendly encounter in Beijing in the mid-1920's. Owing to the social turmoil prevalent then, the game was broken off, to be resumed only three decades later. Unmindful of the creeping war, the Chinese master sent his son to Japan to improve his skill in 1930. The Japanese master, who regarded go-chess as a strong cultural tie transcending war, so concentrated on teaching the young Chinese that he refused to believe the news about the Nanjing massacre. Then, when he finally agreed to the decision of the young Chinese, who had married his daughter, to return to China to join the resistance against the Japanese aggressors, he played into the hands of a right-wing leader by asking the latter to help his son-in-law's passage home. This led to the murder of the young Chinese by the Japanese military police.

As powerful proof of how militarist propaganda could fool the people, there is a scene in the film showing Japanese celebrations of "war victories" with lantern parades.

Chen Huangmei, vice-chairman of the Chinese Film Association, noted that while the film furnishes historical proof of the disaster the aggressive war brought to China, it also describes the hardship the Japanese people suffered. It tells of how the Japanese master's daughter goes insane as a result of her husband's murder.

Yuan Wenshu, another vice-chairman of the film association, said that the film tells that there should be no distinction between nationalities when confronted with militarism; there is only justice and injustice.

Liu Danian, a leading historian, said that the film is true to history not only in revealing the barbarous nature of fascism, but also in bringing out another essential aspect of Sino-Japanese relations. That is, the two peoples have no conflict of fundamental interests. When the two go masters realize this, they finish their game on the Great Wall.

The filming of "The Game Yet To Finish" started in Japan last January and was completed in China late May. It was directed by Junya Sato, who is known in China for his "Proof of Man". Chinese director is Duan Jishun, from the Beijing studio.

Chinese producer Wang Yang spoke highly of the courage and honesty in facing history on the part of Japanese producer Yasuyoshi Tokuma as well as the Japanese director. Wang quoted the Japanese producer as saying "we just want to tell the Japanese youth to watch out for militarism."

The Chinese director called the film project a "happy experience", from bilateral funding, script-writing, directing to casting.

Speaking of the Japanese director, Duan said that the 30 or so films Sato had directed record his constant efforts to innovate. But this time, Sato insisted on realistic performances only. "We both agree that here what moves the audience the most is truthfulness," Duan said.

THAI FOREIGN MINISTER ADDRESSES ASEAN MEETING

OW250835 Beijing XINHUA in English 0746 GMT 25 Aug 82

[Text] Bangkok, August 25 (XINHUA) -- Thai Foreign Minister Sitthi Sawetsila said here yesterday that ASEAN still has to work hard in this "challenging year", both in the political and economic fields. He was addressing a day-long meeting of the Standing Committee of the Association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN) comprising Thailand, the Philippines, Malaysia, Indonesia and Singapore.

This was the first meeting of the ASEAN Standing Committee after Sitthi took over its chairmanship in early July. The main topic of the meeting was economic, social and cultural cooperation among the ASEAN countries.

He said that ASEAN would continue to work closely with the international community to "uphold the sacred principles of sovereignty, territorial integrity and the right of self-determination enshrined in the U.N. Charter which has been flagrantly violated by the invasion and the occupation of Kampuchea."

He pointed out that the Vietnamese stand on the Kampuchean issue remains unchanged as the U.N. General Assembly session is barely one month ahead. "Vietnam has yet to realize that the Democratic Kampuchean Coalition Government under the presidency of Prince Norodom Sihanouk is an important step forward in the search for a peaceful and political solution to the Kampuchean problem," he said.

On the economic front, Sitthi said, ASEAN economic ministers and the task force set up at the 15th ASEAN ministerial meeting in Singapore would take up the challenge facing the ASEAN countries.

He said that he is confident that the task force, entrusted with the task of making comprehensive reviews and appraisal of ASEAN cooperation, would submit important recommendations to the regional bloc.

DHANABALAN ON ASEAN'S ROLE IN WORLD AFFAIRS

OW240229 Beijing XINHUA in English 1852 GMT 23 Aug 82

[Text] Hong Kong, August 23 (XINHUA) -- Singapore Foreign Minister Suppiah Dhanabalan pointed out in an article that the tactics adopted by ASEAN on the Kampuchean issue have shown the possible political role to be played by these countries through interdependence and the possible impact exerted by small countries in the new international political arena, according to SIN CHEW JIT POH today.

The article said: "We have finally drawn people's continued attention to the Kampuchean issue and foiled Vietnam's attempt to create a 'fait accompli'. We have isolated Vietnam politically and economically, and we have held the international conference on Kampuchea." "For small nations, all these were beyond dreams in the past," he added.

The 1980's have brought great changes to international politics, providing opportunities for Singapore and other small nations to sail in a more positive direction.

POLISH FACTORY PARTY LEADERS MEET JARUZELSKI

OW240742 Beijing XINHUA in English 0712 GMT 24 Aug 82

[Text] Warsaw, August 23 (XINHUA) -- First Secretary of the Polish United Workers Party Wojciech Jaruzelski today chaired a meeting of the first secretaries of party committees from 207 major factories in the country to discuss the present home situation.

The meeting pointed out, the Polish press agency PAP said, that the enemy was planning to stir up a wave of unrest at the end of August and early in September. But "this attempt will not have massive support from society," it said. Although society remains split, the majority of the people do not want to lose the hard-earned calm and possibility for normal work.

The meeting stressed the importance of workers self-management in the course of economic reform. It was also pointed out at the meeting that it is necessary to create conditions for the restoration of workers self-management, which is an important part of the reform and socialist democracy.

Observers here believe that the meeting was closely connected with the current Polish socio-political situation in addition to its economic difficulties.

A clandestine magazine of the Solidarity union disclosed that the underground Solidarity organization had declared nation-wide demonstrations in late August and early September to oppose the government and martial law and to mark the second anniversary of the 1980 summer industrial unrest. A clandestine Solidarity radio said the demonstrations in Warsaw would be held between 4:00 to 5:00 p.m. on August 31. The demonstrators would gather at the "Castle Square", the Ursus tractor plant, Warsaw steel works and three other places, and then march along "pre-determined routes".

Jaruzelski said at the end of today's meeting that it was possible to quickly overcome the crisis at the minimum socio-political costs. The enemy knew that time is "in our favour", therefore "they are trying their best to throw logs under our feet to stop our progress," he said.

The Polish party leader said in conclusion that the new offensives of the enemy should be and must be smashed. "We will never go against the line of the ninth party congress and will never desert the road leading to consolidating socialism, eliminating the consequences of distortion and further realizing reformation."

According to another report, Vice-Premier Mieczyslaw Rakowski said in an interview published at the weekend that the authorities would maintain nerves of steel in suppressing demonstrations in support of the suspended Solidarity trade union.

He stressed there could be no negotiations with the underground, and added that regardless of how many people supported the authorities and how many yearned for the restoration of Solidarity, the majority of Poles wanted calm, law and order.

"Therefore I believe the underground has no future," he said.

EGYPT'S GHALI COMMENTS ON PLO EVACUATION

OW241355 Beijing XINHUA in English 1243 GMT 24 Aug 82

[Text] Paris, August 23 (XINHUA) -- The evacuation of Palestine Liberation Organization fighters to various Arab countries is only a "temporary" solution, Egyptian Minister of State for Foreign Affairs Butrus Ghali said here today. He made this statement after he met French External Relations Minister Claude Cheysson earlier today.

Butrus Ghali was on a one-day official visit here on his way back home. The talks between the two foreign ministers concentrated on a joint move for another Security Council resolution on the Palestinian issue.

A Franco-Egyptian draft resolution, which was placed before the Security Council on July 29, stands for the right of all countries in the Middle East region to existence and security and the recognition of the legal national rights of the Palestinian people.

Butrus Ghali called for a positive participation by the United States in a comprehensive Middle East settlement. In view of possible changes in the area, he said, Egypt and France are making efforts to "up-date" their original draft resolution and will show "flexibility" to any suggestion concerning possible amendments to the draft resolution. But he deemed it necessary for the two countries to coordinate their action with that of the United States.
